

PM to Arafat: Change terror green light to red

By HILLEL KUTTLER

WASHINGTON — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu yesterday linked the resumption of broader peace talks to Palestinian Authority action against terrorism, saying he has yet to see the PA issue a "red light" against attacks on Israel.

There is no indication PA Chairman Yasser Arafat is fulfilling his most recent pledge to fight terrorism, Netanyahu charged.

In an interview on CNN's Late Edition, Netanyahu said the first item on the agenda is the "fulfillment of the Palestinian obligation to fight terrorism."

"That is the item that we are going to discuss, and we want to see concrete results. We have so many grievances toward the Palestinians. They are violating the agreement. But I am putting the first condition for peace on the table, and that is I want them to start fighting terrorism as they promised.

"They've given the green light to terrorism. The traffic light hasn't changed. I want to see a red light there and I want to see action against terrorism as they promised. Then we can discuss many, many other issues. Then we can give the peace to our two people."

Netanyahu told the program of his conversation with Arafat following Friday's bomb attack. "He said he'll act, but I can tell you, as of this moment — and some almost 48 hours have gone by — I haven't seen any action."

Netanyahu confirmed that Israel had passed on intelligence to the US to back up his "green light" claim.

Secretary of State Madeleine Albright told CBS's "Face the Nation" that "it's very hard to know exactly" whether Arafat gave Hamas such approval earlier this month, but that "there clearly has been some perception of that."

"There is no question there needs to be improvement in stopping violence, and certainly not supporting terrorism in anyway. But we must remember that Chairman Arafat did condemn the terrorist acts," Albright said.

She said Arafat has invested "100 percent effort" in fighting terrorism, but that the results have fallen short. Albright said the US wants to see talks resume and prefers that the parties tackle difficult issues together, but that the US is prepared to take on a larger role should Israel and the PA request it.

Apropro reopens and Purim plays on

By HELEN KAYE

When the Apropro restaurant on the corner of Adam Hachohen and Ben-Gurion Boulevard reopened for business at about 4 p.m. yesterday, Tel Aviv Mayor Ronni Milo was there.

"I decided to transfer my office here for a few hours," he said. "It's the best way I know to express our feelings that we'll go on living in this city. We shall not surrender to terrorists, but fight them and still go on living our lives the way we want them to be. I have guests from Canada, and I told them that if they want to see me, they will find me in Apropro."

Last Friday, a suicide bomber took three lives and wounded 48 others at Apropro. The windows were shattered, the tables, chairs and big umbrellas smashed and twisted. Yesterday, the interior of the restaurant was its usual immaculate and attractive self. An awning stood naked, stripped of its canvas roof, but otherwise the rainswept courtyard was empty except for the onlookers with their cameras.

The decision to reopen the upscale, popular restaurant as fast as possible was taken shortly after the attack, and work went on around the clock, said Dedi Golan, one of the four partners, "so that we could open our doors to customers as usual."

As luck would have it on Friday, none of the on-duty staff were outside when the bomb went off. The waitresses working yesterday were a fresh crew, but Lior Bort, another of the partners, and the two barmen were back on duty. All spoke of shock, distress and pain, "but we have to keep going," said barman Gil Baumgarten. "The terrorists try to stop our joy, and that's the last thing I'll permit."

Before the mayor and the press surged in, there were not too many people in the place. The Cohens, a middle-aged Tel Aviv couple were having coffee and an ice-cream sundae. They often come to the cafe, they said, but not last Friday. Why today? To see, said Mr. Cohen, "and to hope for good, and that people should live like normal."

And it was rain, not fear, that kept merry-makers away from the "Dizengoff Laughs" Purim celebration yesterday morning. At the main stage on Dizengoff Square, the musicians were packing away the sound system as a steady drizzle dripped off the stacks and brightly colored balloons strung the length of the street.

Dressed in her bright green skirt, dayglo pink fluffy jacket and a clashing carrot-colored wig, master of ceremonies Tali Ron-Alexander said, "we're canceling because of the rain, not because we're scared. We're going to stick around at least until noon and do our show if it clears up."

People's optimism was defiant. "Terrorists won't dictate where we'll go and what we'll do," said Bracha Anirani, from Moshav Beit Hashmonai, who had come with her husband and three of their five children to buy clothes for an upcoming bar mitzva. They were standing, watching Children's Channel star Michal Yanai welcome Purim celebrants live on camera inside the Dizengoff Center. Her first guest was police officer Ya'acov Shoval, who said there were 400 police and border police on duty in the center and on the street from Dizengoff Square to Ben-Gurion Boulevard.

Just outside on King George Street, wreaths were stacked around the memorial to those slain by a suicide bomber last Purim. Now there were more people about on the street. Near one of the stages, students from a local tap dancing school were getting ready to perform. Toddlers were staring big-eyed and bemused at two-legged leopards, lions, tigers, bears, rabbits, 25 of them hired for the day to mingle with the crowds, and a little bit lonely but doing their duty.

Two-year-old Li Ofer, a little scared by a tiger, fled to the safety of her father's arms. Alon Ofer of Tel Aviv said, "I don't think we need to be afraid. It's banal maybe, but we have to go on." A little later, Ron-Alexander started her pitch from one of the stages.

4 Rishon restaurateurs suspected of hiring illegal Palestinians

Four Rishon LeZion restaurant owners who allegedly employed illegal Palestinian workers — including the owner of Formaggio, where Friday's suicide bomber worked until recently — were released yesterday on NIS 20,000 bail each by the Rehovot Magistrate's Court.

A police representative told the court that after the terror attack at the Apropro cafe Friday, a complete closure was imposed on the territories. But when detectives following up on the closure orders came to the restaurants in Rishon's old industrial zone, they found Palestinians still working there.

The police had demanded a 24-hour remand, to complete the investigation, and because keeping the employees working despite the closure was a serious security offense.

But Sassi Gez, the lawyer for Formaggio owner Moshe Zanzuri, asked the court why police arrested only these four employers in Rishon, when they had found hundreds of illegal workers remaining throughout the Dan region.

Clearly it was related to the fact that the suicide bomber had once worked at Formaggio and at one of the other four restaurants, Gez said, "and there is no connection whatsoever between [the bombing] and these men."

Judge Avital Beit-Ner agreed to release the four on bail. The four restaurants were crowded yesterday, with patrons saying they would not let terrorists prevent them from going out. (Itim)

Arabs blame Israel, US for new violence

CAIRO (AP) — Arab officials and newspapers condemned Friday's suicide bombing at Tel Aviv's Apropro cafe, but said that Israel's decision to build on Har Homa, and two US vetoes against moves to condemn the housing plan in the UN, fueled the violence.

In statements carried by Cairo newspapers yesterday, Egyptian Foreign Minister Amr Moussa said his government "regretted" the bombing but said "(Prime Minister Benjamin) Netanyahu is responsible for what is happening."

Qatar — which had at one point broken Arab ranks to consider trade links with Israel — condemned the Tel Aviv attack in a statement Saturday night by Foreign Ministry spokesman Fawaz Ahmed Attiyah.

But Attiyah added that Qatar had repeatedly warned that Israel's settlement policy "in Jerusalem and other occupied Arab territories could undermine the peace process and plunge the region into a state of tension and violence."

IDF to demolish bomber's house

The army plans to demolish the house of suicide bomber Moussa Ranimat in the West Bank village of Tsurif, near Hebron.

But Israel Radio reported that the family has been given time to petition to the High Court of Justice against the demolition.

The army placed a curfew on the village and arrested 13 residents, including members of Ranimat's family. The army also sealed Ranimat's home and barred reporters from the area.

Ranimat was known as a devout father of four who seemed to lead a quiet life, but some who knew him noted he was a Hamas supporter and was growing increasingly desperate about his financial situation.

"Economically, the family is not so well," said Sharif Hassan, Ranimat's relative through marriage. "All the money they make goes to keep food on the table."

Hamas usually provides generous sustenance for the families of its "martyrs." But there is no evidence yet that this had been arranged in this case, and no traditional videotape of the bomber explaining his motives and saying a public good-bye to his family.

Ranimat was last seen in Tsurif a week ago, when he took his one-year-old son Mohammed for treatment of his asthma in Hebron. "Moussa seemed especially worried [and] said, 'Only God can cure him,'" Hassan said.

Ranimat was the second of the 11 children of Abdel Kader Ranimat, 65. The tall, athletic youth was known for his polite manner and good behavior, and rarely engaged in political activity. In 1990, he spent 18 days in prison after being arrested during an IDF sweep in the village. Ranimat's two brothers were also arrested and charged with throwing stones and belonging to Hamas.

Immediately after high school, Ranimat went to work in Israel. He came home every two weeks. He would spend Fridays at the village mosque and talking to village elders. His father and two brothers are construction workers in Israel.

"The family as a whole is religious. The women wear Islamic dress and all of the men pray and fast," Hassan said. "[But] just because one is observant does not mean they are Hamas bombers."

Hundreds mourn at victims' funerals

By Jerusalem Post Staff and Itim

Hundreds of relatives, friends, neighbors and colleagues turned out yesterday afternoon for the funerals of the three women murdered in Friday's terror attack in Tel Aviv.

Anat Winter-Rosen, whose infant daughter Shani was wounded in the attack, was buried at the Kfar Nahman Cemetery near Ra'anana. Her friend Yael Gilad's funeral took place at the Holon Cemetery.

Dr. Michal Avrahami was buried at Tel Aviv's Kiryat Shaul Cemetery. Her husband, Shai, who was with her at the time of the attack, could not attend the funeral. He was still at Ichilov Hospital, recovering from moderate wounds.

"As we stand here, we all feel an immense pain," Tel Aviv Mayor Ronni Milo said at the funeral. "Instead of Michal celebrating her birthday, which is in only a few weeks, we are forced to bury her."

Avrahami, 31, was 16 weeks pregnant with her first child. She had been sitting in the cafe with Shai, her mother-in-law, Maya, and her three-year-old niece, when the bomb went off. She was taken to Ichilov in critical condition and died seven hours later. Avrahami worked in the Radiology Department at Wolfson Hospital in Holon.

In his eulogy for Winter-Rosen, who was raised in Ra'anana, the town's mayor, Ze'ev Bilski, read a letter her mother, Zehava Rosen, had written to Shani the day she was born.

"I hope that you will grow up in a world where all is good, loving and beautiful. I pray that you will grow up in the land flowing with milk and honey, [a land] of peace and love," the grandmother had written six months ago.

"We all are sorry, dear Zehava," Bilski said, "that your prayer for 'a world where all is good, loving and beautiful' was not fulfilled."

Winter-Rosen, 31, a newly qualified Herzliya attorney, had taken Shani with her to meet Yael and Michal Gilad at Cafe Apropro. Afterwards, she was to meet her husband, Dr. Michael Winter, at the dental clinic where he works on Dizengoff.

Instead, he said he saw Shani on television being carried by a policewoman and he went immediately to Ichilov Hospital. He was later told of his wife's death.

Winter-Rosen had been waiting with Yael for her twin sister Michal to arrive at the cafe — but Michal was late, which saved her life. Yael and Anat had changed tables in the cafe to allow Shani to be in the sun.

On her way to Apropro, Michal heard the explosion while driving in her car. "There was a deep bond between Yael and I, a bond to watch out for one another all of our lives, whatever would happen," Michal said in her eulogy at Yael's funeral yesterday. "Now I am no longer able to worry about her. She will worry about me from heaven."

Gilad, 32, was a social worker who worked at the Rabin Medical Center-Beilinson Campus in Petah Tikva. Among her other responsibilities, she provided help to families of terror victims.

Only after social workers came to help the family after the attack, said her father Moshe, did he understand how important the work his daughter did was. The head of the department in which she worked said dozens of her former clients had contacted him after the attack.

US issues terror warning

WASHINGTON (Reuters) — The United States this weekend advised Americans in Israel to be wary of possible terror attacks, noting that past bombings have taken place at bus stops, on Sundays and at rush hours.

The US embassy in Tel Aviv and consulate-general in Jerusalem issued the advisory, stating: "Although they have not been specifically targeted for attack, US citizens have been killed in past terrorist actions in Israel, the West Bank and Gaza."

"The US government has no information that such actions have been planned for the immediate future, but citizens are reminded that in the past, premeditated terrorist attacks have frequently taken place on Sunday morning and at rush hours."

"Violent attacks have also involved passengers on buses and at bus stops," the statement said.

The statement "strongly advised" US citizens in Israel to avoid large crowds and political demonstrations and to leave areas where demonstrations or altercations appeared to be developing. "Such gatherings can occur spontaneously and have the potential to become violent without warning," the statement said.

The announcement was in effect through April 15.

Meanwhile, clashes erupted in Hebron for a third day yesterday, as the Palestinian Police defended its record in bringing them under control and blamed Israel for causing them in the first place.

The clashes were far smaller than the riots on Friday and Saturday, and the Palestinian Police was seen to impose order more quickly. The IDF removed the curfew it imposed Friday on H2, the area of the city where Israel retains control.

In Gaza, meanwhile, doubts emerged over Palestinian security reports that Ibrahim Makadmeh, a militant Hamas leader who spoke out in favor of suicide attacks at a Khan Yunis rally on Friday, had been arrested together with 30 other militants. He was being investigated, said some security sources, while others said he was not arrested, but not at home either.

Palestinian Authority Attorney-General Khalid Qidrah said there is a warrant out for Makadmeh's arrest for incitement, Itim reported.

Maj.-Gen. Ya'alon accused Rajoub and Fatah activists under him of leading the earlier riots in Hebron. Rajoub himself met yesterday with Internal Security Minister Avigdor Kahalani and reassured that the police had done everything it could, despite Israel's "crazy policies."

"We will make every effort to end violence, which firstly harms Palestinian interests," Rajoub said at a televised press conference with Kahalani.

Kahalani noted the two internal security chiefs hardly knew each other until yesterday. Their meeting lasted 75 minutes, "because it is important to get to know each other," Kahalani said. "We are eager to establish a channel of communications, so we have established a direct line between our offices."

Kahalani said he would introduce Rajoub to the new Judea and Samaria police commanders.

There was little Palestinian reaction to government indications that it was suspending political talks with the PA until the security situation improves. "There have hardly been any talks for the past two months," said Arafat adviser Ahmed Tibi on Channel 1's Mabat evening news.

Tibi denied Arafat had given any "green light" to Hamas and said the Tel Aviv suicide bomber came from Tsurif village in area C, which is under IDF control.

Arafat to Moslems: 'Save' Jerusalem

ISLAMABAD (AP) — Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat warned yesterday that the peace process was on the verge of collapse and issued a plea to Islamic leaders worldwide to "rescue" Jerusalem from Israel.

In a 10-minute speech to Islamic leaders, Arafat accused Israel of reneging on the terms of the peace agreement and warned that time was running out.

"Very serious events and developments concerning the peace process... have led us almost to a point where the whole process could be undermined," he said.

achievements and the hopes that were raised because of that process," said Arafat.

Without saying what he expected from the Islamic world, Arafat said it was the "duty" of all Moslems "to rescue Jerusalem from the settlements, from the danger of Judaism. I urge you to act rapidly and seriously to save it."

Before Arafat spoke, Pakistan's president opened the summit with a scathing attack on construction plans for Har Homa. President Farooq Leghari also assailed the West for what he called its "hostile view of Islam."

The meeting, which coincides with

Pakistan's celebration of 50 years of independence from Britain, is intended to underline the nation's solidarity with the rest of the Moslem world and to target problems facing Moslems as they move into the next century. "Sadly our enlightened and tolerant faith is being portrayed in the West as the harbinger of hate and violence," said Leghari. "Unfortunately the West, by and large, is taking a hostile view of Islam and Islamic revivalism."

The heads of state of 54 nations were invited, but friction with Iran kept many high-level Arab leaders away.

Arafat, who arrived late Saturday, had kept his participation a secret until the final hour.

The Pakistani army parolled outside the summit site, a $14 million convention center commissioned by former prime minister Benazir Bhutto to mark Pakistan's anniversary of independence.

Construction of the center was cited as one of her government's excesses when she was thrown out of power in November on charges of corruption and economic mismanagement.

The summit is expected to cost cash-strapped Pakistan about $7.5 million.

Bombing unlikely to affect Pessah tourism

By HANI SHAPIRO

Last week's bomb in Tel Aviv may well hit tourism to Israel, but for Heidi Bruendler, who was in Eilat for an industry forum on travel to the Red Sea resort, the tragedy seemed as far away as her native Switzerland. Bruendler, a sales executive for First Business Travel International in Zurich, was one of 80 attendees at the conference, which began Thursday.

Yoni Joffe, of Isrotel, one of the conference organizers, said that while the bombing could not help tourism, it did serve to show that Eilat was unaffected by the incident in Tel Aviv. "It showed them how safe Eilat is," Joffe said.

Tourism Ministry Director-General David Litvak said it was too early to determine the effect of the bombing on tourism. There would be little effect on Pessah visitors, who include many religious Jews spending the holiday with close family, he said. Nor would the incident deter Christian pilgrims coming for Easter next weekend, he added.

When travel agents abroad return to their office today, he said, the ministry would have a better understanding of the effects on long-range tourism, Litvak said. "It certainly doesn't help us," he said.

For Bruendler, the bombing doesn't change the equation for travel to Israel. On the one hand, she said, Eilat has the sun, the desert, watersports and special attractions, such as a beduin dinner she attended.

On the other hand, politics already make Israel a hard sell. "It is already not easy to convince people to go to Israel, because of the political situation, but the bombing won't make harder," she said.

International TB Day marked today

By JUDY SIEGEL

International Tuberculosis Day will be marked today here and abroad, as the number of cases is on the upswing. The Health Ministry is marking the occasion with its first national workshop on controlling TB, which is open at the Rabin Medical Center-Bellinson Campus.

From 1990 to 1993, there were 2.3 million reported new cases a year, compared to only 2.9 million annually between 1984 and 1986. The number of actual cases is believed to be twice those figures. The causes of the increase, according to health officials, are immigration and tourism, a decline in the socioeconomic conditions of the poor, reduced financial resources for treating the disease, and AIDS, which in some countries is accompanied by TB infections as well.

TB does not pass easily from one person to another. One must be in close contact for prolonged periods, and the bacteria are transmitted in only three out of 10 cases of close contact. In addition, only one in 20 people who are infected will develop the disease within five years. Fortunately, a symptomless carrier of the disease cannot infect others and doesn't endanger those around him.

Treatment requires the patient to take a cocktail of drugs over a period of at least six months. Any cessation of treatment can seriously reduce the efficacy of the antibiotics and cause the development of resistant bacteria. Thus supervision of patients is important.

The World Health Organization recommends, and the Health Ministry has adopted, the technique of directly observed therapy (DOT), in which patients come to clinics for their medications. The number of reported cases here was 439 last year, compared to only 384 in 1995.

DOT centers have been set up at Barzilai and Nahariya Hospitals, the Anglican Hospital in Nazareth, the League for the Prevention of Lung Diseases and TB in Tel Aviv, the Roka Institute in Jerusalem, and the community lung clinics in Haifa, Netanya, Rehovot and Beersheba. Patients needing hospitalization are admitted to Sieff Hospital in Safed and Shmuel Harofeh Hospital in Be'er Ya'acov.

IDF lifts Hebron curfew

By MARGOT DUDKEVITCH

The IDF yesterday lifted the curfew that had been in effect since Friday in Hebron. The curfew had been imposed after severe rioting took place in Hebron on Friday and Saturday, leaving over 100 wounded in severe clashes between Palestinians and the IDF.

In the tense calm that remained throughout the day in Hebron several incidents of stones being thrown at IDF troops were reported. According to the IDF spokesman, firebombs were thrown at an IDF post at the Zuhait Junction in Hebron but caused no damage or injuries.

Additional troops, including IDF soldiers and border policemen, were sent to reinforce the position, the spokesman said.

At noon in Hebron, scores of children dressed in colorful costumes held a Purim parade.

"The children will walk from Tel Rumeida to the Machpela Cave," said Hebron community spokesman Nossam Amon, adding that all was quiet in the Jewish quarters.

Meanwhile, the IDF closed the section of the road leading from Rachel's Tomb to the entrance of Bethlehem (Area A) to all vehicles after cars were stoned. The IDF spokesman stressed that Rachel's Tomb remained open to worshippers.

More funds needed to launch student satellite

By DAVID RUDGE

The Israeli Space Agency and the Technion are seeking additional funding to ensure that the students' satellite, TechSat 2, gets off the ground.

Abi Har-Even, director-general of the agency, which, under the auspices of the Science Ministry, is one of the main financial backers of the satellite project, said several hundred thousand dollars are still required.

He said the money was needed to cover the scheduled launch, aboard a Russian Zenith three-stage space rocket, as well as other costs, including insuring the satellite in the case of launch failure or loss.

The previous satellite, TechSat 1, crashed into the sea in March 1995 after the launch vehicle—a converted Russian SS-25 ballistic missile—failed to reach orbit altitude.

The first satellite took over three years to design and construct. It cost some $3.5 million and it was not insured against loss.

The new micro satellite, which has been constructed by Technion students aided by experts from Israeli high-tech companies, was originally scheduled to be launched on a Russian rocket this summer from Baikonur in Kazakhstan.

Har-Even said that because of technical matters relating to the Russian rocket, the launch date had been rescheduled for the fall.

The Israeli Space Agency is helping to fund the Technion project because of the importance attached to testing some new components and equipment integrated into the satellite, as well as for its educational merit, he said.

A satellite of this size, measuring just 48 cm. around and weighing less than 50 kg, had never been tested in space, he added.

"This project has several new technological developments, particularly in the field of miniaturization, including an ozone detector, mini-computer, horizon detector and navigational control system," said Har-Even.

He said that if the project succeeded and the new components and devices were tested and proven in space they would become commercially viable products.

"The new miniaturized equipment will be sold much more easily if it will be space qualified by this satellite and the commercial potential, in that event, would be quite extensive," said Har-Even.

"Some commercial companies in the field of communication and remote sensing are interested in this satellite because of its low weight and extremely low power consumption," he added.

Lau forgoes wedding income

Chief Rabbi Yisrael Lau said yesterday that he will no longer accept money for officiating at weddings and instead recommend that couples contribute to charity.

"I have a responsibility to create a new public standard," he said. "From today, I will not agree to take a donation for officiating at a wedding and I will propose to couples that ask me to marry them to donate to one of the voluntary organizations that I recommend, or to any other organization they prefer."

Lau recommended that couples contribute to several organizations that help the sick and wounded, as well as Netanya's Laniado Hospital, AMCHA and the National Center for Family Purty.

He also released a statement from his accountant saying they will include the money Lau has received for performing weddings in his tax statements.

Two Palestinians wounded at checkpoint

Soldiers shot and wounded two Palestinians at the Gilo checkpoint south of Jerusalem yesterday morning, after one tried to enter Israel with a forged Israeli identity card, and tried to flee when the forgery was discovered.

According to the IDF Spokesman, soldiers who searched the Palestinian found his Palestinian identity card, at which point the man fled towards a waiting car. Soldiers fired in the air, but when the man did not stop and jumped into the car, the soldiers fired at the car, wounding the man and another man inside. A third man who was in the car fled and headed towards Bethlehem. AP

Rabin memorial sculpture defaced in capital

A sculpture adjacent to Jerusalem's City Hall dedicated to former prime minister Yitzhak Rabin was found defaced yesterday morning with the words "Rabin the murderer" scrawled on its base.

The Roy Liechtenstein sculpture, which was dedicated by Mayor Ehud Olmert just three weeks ago, had been presented to the city by the Israel Museum.

"It's highly disrespectful to the memory of Yitzhak Rabin," said James Snyder, director of the museum. "It's disrespectful of the work, and the spirit in which the sculpture was given to the city, which was for a public display as a memorial and not as a political statement."

Police are investigating the incident.

Hong Kong nears end of colonial rule

News agencies

HONG KONG - With colonial rule ending in 100 days, thousands of people celebrated Hong Kong's impending return to China by marching, jogging or planting trees yesterday.

Along their route, the marchers mostly ignored four people demonstrating with tape over their mouths in a silent protest against the erosion of press freedom they expect after the July 1 change of sovereignty.

A gray drizzle blanketed the British colony as it marked the last countdown to the handover but there were few signs that gloom would cast a pall over the final days of colonial rule.

Organizers said more than 6,000 people joined in a two-kilometer march that began in a park named after Queen Victoria, who reigned when Britain set up the colony in 1841.

Far to the north of Hong Kong, hundreds of Beijing residents checked off the seconds as the digital clock in the Chinese capital's Tiananmen Square flashed down to midnight and the 100-day mark for the recovery of Hong Kong.

"We have endured 100 years of shame, 100 years of resistance and 100 years of waiting," said

China's Guangming Daily. "Now in another 100 days, the hopes of generations will be realized."

For the vast majority of Hong Kong's 6.4 million hardworking populace, it was just another Sunday, a welcome day off for a community which works a five-and-a-half day week.

The marchers beat drums, blew trumpets and waved both five-star Chinese flags and post-colonial Hong Kong flags of bauhinia flower petals. Some of the colorful banners read: "Welcome return to China," and "Stable transition."

Near the queen's bronze statue in the park, marchers passed by the four demonstrators, who held a Chinese flag dyed black and were closely guarded by dozens of policemen.

"We support the end of colonial rule," said Lee Kin-yin, 19, one of the protesters. "But Hong Kong should return to a country that cares about the interests of its people."

"They are singing and dancing to cover up the gloomy future," said Lee, protesting China's plans to water down Hong Kong's human rights laws.

Lydia Lau, a legal firm secretary, disagreed.

Lau, who took her 3-year-old boy along on the march, said she did not like confrontation, and was excited about Hong Kong's impending return to its mother country.

"At last it's coming. We've waited long," she said.

Because of China's growing economy, Lau said she was confident that Hong Kong would continue its growth after the handover.

Chan Kam-hung, a jewelry shop salesman, clapped his hands while watching the march in front of his shop, on a main street frequently used for pro-democracy mass rallies.

"Today's march is peaceful and fun to watch. I am tired of protest rallies. I worry that people would get too emotional and might take radical action," said Chan.

As a guest on a regular weekly program on government radio, Gov. Chris Patten urged China to honor its promise that Hong Kong can maintain a high degree of autonomy for 50 years.

"I hope that some of China's advisers will stop seeing Hong Kong in terms of a struggle, will stop tilting against so-called British windmills," Patten said.

He said Hong Kong should be governed "with a light touch."

"You can't turn the clock back on what Hong Kong has become, any more than you can reverse

Hong Kong residents wave Chinese flags at a rally yesterday celebrating the 100-day countdown to Chinese rule.

the countdown." Patten has been at odds with Beijing for his political reforms in Hong Kong, made without China's approval.

"Hong Kong is, as I said recently, a smoothly functioning community. It's like a Rolls Royce," Patten said in a Radio Hong Kong broadcast.

"All you need to do if you're in charge is to slip into the driving seat, switch on the ignition and away you go."

"I don't quite see the point of lifting the bonnet to tinker with the engine. That only raises worries about whether it will work so well, and whether you may be persuaded by some people to start stripping it down for spare parts." China's envoy to Hong Kong, Zhou Nan, brushed aside these concerns and urged Hong Kong people to unite around future leader Tung Chee-hwa, a 59-year-old shipping magnate anointed by Beijing in December to step into Patten's shoes.

Dalai Lama in Taiwan

KAOHSIUNG, Taiwan (AP) - About 40,000 followers packed an outdoor stadium yesterday as the Dalai Lama, the exiled Tibetan spiritual leader, preached Buddhism in a light rain on his first visit to Taiwan.

Sitting in front of a Tanka Tibetan holy painting, the Dalai Lama delivered a two-hour sermon on Buddhist philosophy at Chungchong Stadium.

China, which claims Taiwan and has governed Tibet with military force since a 1950 invasion, has condemned his visit as a plot to split the country.

The Dalai Lama is scheduled to meet Taiwan President Lee Teng-hui before ending his six-day visit - an event China sees as a pairing of "splitists."

But during a tour of a Buddhist temple earlier yesterday, the Dalai Lama told well-wishers he hoped the Han Chinese and Tibetans could get along and help each other because a harmonious relationship would bring good for both.

Intense media scrutiny and crowds of protesters for and against his visit have led to tight security around the Dalai Lama. His limousine was sandwiched in a 20-car motorcade, a treatment usually reserved for foreign heads of state.

Crowds followed wherever he went, but many seemed more awed by his celebrity status than his religious authority. Most Taiwanese follow a mixture of Buddhism, Taoism and Chinese folk religion.

US troops in Congo on Zaire standby

News agencies

BRAZZAVILLE, Congo - A US Army airborne unit arrived in Brazzaville yesterday to prepare for the possible evacuation of Americans and other foreigners from neighboring Zaire.

A C-17 transport plane carrying equipment and the first of about 100 paratroopers based in northern Italy landed at midday in Brazzaville, just across the Zaire River from the Zairian capital of Kinshasa.

Belgium planned to send 600 troops last night and today. A 30-person US military vanguard and more than 100 French soldiers on a similar mission arrived yesterday.

About 500 American civilians are in embattled Zaire, including about 320 in Kinshasa. There are also an estimated 7,000 Europeans in Kinshasa, including 3,000 Belgians and 1,000 French citizens.

Rebels opposed to ailing President Mobutu Sese Seko control a vast swath of eastern Zaire, and their leaders denounce talk of cease-fires.

The ailing president returned to the forefront of Zaire's political stage yesterday to receive a letter from South African President Nelson Mandela on ending the war with rebels fighting for Mobutu's overthrow.

Mandela's deputy Thabo Mbeki, who delivered the letter, said afterwards that a UN peace plan for a truce and talks was at the heart of efforts to end Zaire's five-month-old civil war.

But rebel leader Laurent Kabila, speaking in Zaire's captured third city of Kisangani, once again ruled out calls for a truce before talks - a message 10,000 supporters endorsed before U.N. special envoy Mohamed Sahnoun.

Mobutu, looking tired and thin but wearing his trademark leopard-skin hat and a dark suit, was appearing in public for the first time since returning home from France on Friday.

"I am Mobutu. I have returned not to devote myself to Mobutu's interests or Mobutu's fortune as you write from time to time but to the higher interests of Zaire," he told journalists.

"That is to say our unity, our territorial integrity." Asked how he felt, Mobutu, who left hospital in Monaco after fresh cancer treatment on Wednesday, replied: "The way I look." Mobutu, who has spent most of his time in Europe since prostate cancer surgery in August, welcomed Mbeki with an embrace. Zaire's embattled Prime Minister Kengo wa Dondo attended the talks which lasted about half an hour.

Aides to Mbeki, who was at the heart of a bid by Mandela to broker peace between Mobutu and the rebels last month, said Mobutu had promised a reply to the letter within 48 hours.

"He is studying that communication and will be responding to it fairly shortly," Mbeki told reporters. "We are convinced that the immediate future steps will be taken practically, to move the peace process forward towards a resolution."

He said the U.N. Security Council had spelled out "a very important position" in a resolution and he highlighted its call for a ceasefire and negotiations. "I think that these are particular matters of focus that everyone is looking at," he added.

Police smash Belarus protest

MINSK (AP) - An estimated 10,000 people marched to a "Day of Freedom" rally yesterday, the latest in a series of demonstrations against the Soviet-style rule of Belarus President Alexander Lukashenko.

Police used clubs and tear gas in an attempt to break up the march, which was unauthorized, but made no attempt to stop the rally itself. No serious injuries were reported.

Police detained about 300 people, according to Vyacheslav Sivchik, secretary of the opposition Belarusian Popular Front, which sponsored the rally. He said authorities boarded trains to arrest Popular Front delegations from the cities of Brest, Baranovich and Kobrin.

Among those detained for taking part in the march were the first secretary of the US Embassy in Belarus, Serge Alexandrov, an ethnic Belarusian, and former Interior Minister Yuri Zakharenko, the Interfax news agency reported.

The march and rally were timed to coincide with the 79th anniversary of the proclamation of Belarus' short-lived Popular Republic.

"We are here not only to pay tribute to the historic event, but to express our support of democratic and sovereign way of development," declared Semyon Sharetzky, a leader of the Popular Front and former speaker of the parliament that was dissolved by Lukashenko.

"We must fight for this," he added.

Report: Swiss banks helped prolong war

LONDON (AP) - Swiss help in financing Nazi Germany extended World War II for two years, the Independent on Sunday newspaper reported.

The newspaper detailed allegations by Swiss professor Jean Ziegler, who says gold-for-currency swaps between Swiss banks and Berlin gave vital help to the Nazi war machine from 1943 to 1945.

"I consider it proven that the Swiss contributed significantly to the prolonging of the war," Ziegler, sociology professor at Geneva and Sorbonne universities, told the newspaper.

Ziegler makes the claim in a newly published book, Switzerland, the Gold and the Dead, published recently in German and French.

"Without the fencing of stolen gold, the Reich would have had no currency, no possibility of buying strategic materials and the Wehrmacht would have faltered," Ziegler was quoted as saying.

"Hitler was dependent on the Swiss dealing in stolen gold," he added.

Ziegler told the newspaper material from his research came from German archive sources such as the German Armaments Ministry.

Ziegler quoted a memorandum dated May 1943, from Walther Funk, head of the Reichsbank, saying he "could not forgo Swiss foreign currency dealings, particularly not the conversion of gold into hard currency, for longer than two months."

Nixon ordered 'kike' booted

By TOM TUGEND

LOS ANGELES - A federal immigration official was labeled as a "kike" by President Richard Nixon, according to recently released White House tapes of Nixon's phone conversations.

The official was George Rosenberg, district director of the US Immigration and Naturalization Service in Los Angeles.

In early October 1971, Rosenberg's agents had caught 36 illegal immigrants in a raid on a food processing company owned by Romana Banuelos. Three weeks earlier, Banuelos had been named by Nixon to be Treasurer of the United States.

On Oct. 7, in a taped phone conversation, Nixon ordered Attorney General John N. Mitchell to transfer Rosenberg to another post.

"The fellow out there in the immigration service is a kike by the name of Rosenberg," said Nixon. "He is out. He is to be out."

"Transfer him to some other place out of Los Angeles. I don't give a goddamn what the story is! He went on television. You put him out for going on television, which is a violation."

Nixon's slur was contained in tapes recently opened for public inspection by the National Archives. It is cited in the April issue of the American Journalism Review, according to a news story in last Saturday's Los Angeles Times.

The Times had reported the arrest of the illegal immigrants at Banuelos' company in the same Oct. 7 phone conversation. Nixon ordered Mitchell to conduct an INS raid on the newspaper in search of illegal immigrants.

Bacall's brilliant breakfast

By BOB THOMAS

In predicting Academy Awards, it pays to heed this maxim: Never underestimate the power of a legend.

The history of the awards is studded with examples of stars who have been rewarded with Oscars after long service to the cinema. The honored performances may not be the best of their careers, but debut in To Have and Have Not opposite her future husband, Humphrey Bogart. Few Hollywood marriages have been as chronicled as that one.

"I'm in a state of shock," she exclaimed when she won her Golden Globe for her supporting role in The Mirror Has Two Faces.

"This is the first time I've been nominated for a role in any film." That is remarkable in view of her long career. But seldom had she enjoyed such a well-rounded character as Hannah Morgan, the lonely widow who tries to control her free-spirited daughter, Barbra Streisand.

Bacall's breakfast scene in which she tells her daughter of her own broken dreams was enough to win a nomination, perhaps the Oscar.

Four other remarkable performances have been nominated for supporting actress: Nominated for her role in The Crucible, Joan Allen is the only previous nominee in this category, having been honored last year for her sensitive role as the president's wife in Nixon. This year's nomination came for the role of Elizabeth Proctor in Arthur Miller's story of intolerance in the American Colonies.

Allen came out of Chicago's prestigious Steppenwolf Theater, and has starred in films such as Peggy Sue Got Married, and Mad Love.

Juliette Binoche, as the young Canadian nurse who cares for the badly burned Ralph Fiennes in The English Patient, brought a note of compassion into a harsh tale. The Paris-born Binoche earned a reputation for independence when she declined a role in Steven Spielberg's Jurassic Park in favor of an art film, Blue.

Barbara Hershey's role in The Portrait of a Lady as the complex, mysterious Madame Merle was "the most difficult I ever had, challenging in many ways." In recent years, she co-starred with Robert Redford (The Natural), Gene Hackman (Hoosiers), Sam Shepard (The Right Stuff) and Danny DeVito (Tim Men).

Marianne Jean-Baptiste, nominated for Secrets and Lies, says of her director Mike Leigh: "He offers you a chance to go somewhere as an actor that you normally never go."

Like most English actors, she received her training in repertory, appearing in classics as well as modern plays. She has also written and appeared in a play, Ave Africa, and has recorded a blues album. (AP)

Lauren Bacall: Nominated for best supporting actress the awards are heartfelt and well-deserved.

In 1930-31, Marie Dressler won for a minor film, Min and Bill, after a career that dated back to 1914 and Tillie's Punctured Romance. Humphrey Bogart was overlooked for his greatest role in Casablanca in 1942 and finally rewarded for The African Queen in 1951.

After 250 movies, John Wayne was handed the big prize in 1969 for his boozing, one-eyed old-timer, Rooster Cogburn, in True Grit. A top star in the 1930s and 1940s, Don Ameche returned to the screen in his 80s and took the supporting actor award for Cocoon in 1985.

In his eighth nomination, Paul Newman was finally chosen a winner for The Color of Money in 1986. Long after his James Bond days, Sean Connery won as supporting actor in The Untouchables in 1987. Jessica Tandy, the original Blanche DuBois in A Streetcar Named Desire, was honored for Dying Young in 1989 when she was 83.

Which brings us to the legend among this year's supporting actress nominees - Lauren Bacall of The Mirror Has Two Faces. She has been a star since her 1944

MOVIE REVIEW

Bumbling bureaucrat Rollo Lee (John Cleese) finds his sanity begin to unravel when he's assigned to run Marwood Zoo.

Animal crackers!

By ADINA HOFFMAN

Fierce Creatures reunites the cast of the enormously successful 1988 British farce, A Fish Called Wanda, and works just as a follow-up comedy should: instead of confining the actors to the repetition of a few tried-and-true shits, the filmmakers turn in the ensemble's chemistry and set them loose to try on different roles. The strength of both pictures lies in John Cleese's script - he wrote the new movie with film critic Iain Johnston - and in the actors' complementary personalities. While Fierce Creatures does seem a bit tamer

FIERCE CREATURES

Directed by Robert Young & Fred Schepisi. Screenplay by John Cleese & Iain Johnston. Hebrew title: Hoyot Ra'ot. 93 minutes. English dialogue. Hebrew subtitles. Parental guidance suggested. With John Cleese, Kevin Kline, Jamie Lee Curtis, Michael Palin and Ronnie Corbett.

than the first movie, it's also marked by flashes of mad inspiration. An all-too-accurate spoof of corporate take-over culture, the picture features Kevin Kline as mustachioed tycoon Rod McCain, the cold-blooded owner of a multinational conglomerate called Octopus Inc., and a hilariously obvious caricature of media mogul Rupert Murdoch. McCain speaks in a broad New Zealand accent and, in one typical scene, greets a Meet the Press-style television panel with the words "Sow! Yew must be the intellectuals."

The film's central joke revolves around McCain's acquisition of a zoo in England. An institution formerly devoted to the conservation of rare or endangered species, Marwood is now scheduled for an overhaul. No animal-lover he, McCain is only interested in the bottom line, so he dispatches a rather bumbling bureaucrat from one of his Hong Kong TV stations, Rollo Lee (Cleese), to downsize and increase profits by at least 20 percent.

Lee's scheme? Violence sells. From now on, the zoo will only feature "fierce creatures." Not surprisingly, his plan doesn't go over too well with the animal-keepers, a comically earnest bunch (members include Michael Palin, Robert Lindsay, Ronnie Corbett, Carey Lowell and Cleese's real-life daughter, Cynthia) who seem to prefer critics of the Flopsy-Mopsy-Contortail school to man-eating grizzly bears, and who launch a campaign to convince their new director of the homicidal ferocity of sea lions, anteaters, cuddly lemurs and the like.

Enter McCain's unloved son, Vince (also Kline), who arrives at the zoo with high-powered executive Willa Weston (Jamie Lee Curtis) and ideas of his own about turning things around: he means to convert the animal sanctuary into a gigantic theme park with corporate logos on every cage, celebrity sponsorships of different beasts (i.e. "Bruce Springsteen's tortoise"), and day-glo costumes for all the keepers. Pandemonium, it goes without saying, ensues.

Directors Robert Young and Fred Schepisi, responsible for the beginning of the film and the end, respectively, both approach the patently silly material with a light touch, a technique that dovetails nicely with the actors' broad style. Cleese is especially funny here, doing his usual respectable-citizen-caught-with-his-fly-down routine. In the film's single throw-back to the unchecked bad taste of the actor's Monty Python days, he attempts unsuccessfully to stifle a geyser of lewd Freudian slips that gush from his mouth when he's faced with Curtis's cleavage.

Kline gets laughs by hamming in a more extroverted and slap-happy way, and Curtis, for her part, plays the sexpot and straight woman amiably enough. The cast is rounded out by an expressive menagerie of not-so-fierce-creatures, including meerkats, wallabies, a baby ostrich, and my favorite, a contemplative-looking gorilla.

This hairy monkey need only sigh deeply and gaze into the camera to upstage the entire, accomplished cast which is, after all, only human.

A tale of two theaters

By HELEN KAYE

It's New Season Time, and they held their press conference the same week. Other than that, the Cameri and the Haifa theaters couldn't have been more different in style and substance.

The Haifa Theater takes enormous risks deliberately, introducing new local playwrights every season "because you have to go on looking for the new generation, keep on training them," says administrator Yitzhak Kluger. "They need backing while they're looking for that inner layer which represents the voice of this country, the play that can be done only here."

As far as possible, the Cameri goes for the sure thing, and at the press briefing, artistic director Omri Nitzan trots out his stable of thoroughbred authors "because the Cameri is the natural home of Israel's finest playwrights."

For the past couple of seasons, the Haifa Theater has been falling flat on its face with production after production, such as Meir Sussman's Indigo or the top-heavy Sweet Bird of Youth. On the other hand, the Cameri's Midas touch produces hit after hit and if a play flops, like last year's revival of Nissim Aloni's The American Princess, the Tel Aviv production juggernaut rolls over it majestically.

But the past is the past, and both theaters have introduced intriguing seasons, each in its own way. For the State's 50th anniversary Haifa promises "a continuing theatrical celebration" while the Cameri speaks of "good Israeli theater well performed."

Whether or not it commissions plays from only "bankable" playwrights, the Cameri's Nitzan and general manager Noam Semel are genuinely committed to performing original plays and '97/98 will see new ones by Yosef Bar-Yosef, Edna Mazia, Hanoch Levin, Yehoshua Sobol, two by Hillel Mitterpunkt, and a debut play by novelist Yitzhak Ben-Ner.

Among the local plays Ben-Ner's Urimuri is "an impossible love story," as he puts it, between a middle-aged man and his adopted Ethiopian daughter. Mitterpunkt's The Player takes on this generation's religious/secular kadurkump within the framework of an 18th-century company of itinerant actors in Poland, and his second show is Mr. Wolf, an Israelized version of

The Cameri 'is the natural home of Israel's finest playwrights,' says artistic director Omri Nitzan. (Michael Hirsch)

Ben Jonson's Volpone. Sobol's Alma (which had an acclaimed premiere at the Vienna Festival last year) is about colorful Alma Mahler, the composer's wife.

Also on the roster are As You Like It by Shakespeare, Ibsen's The Doll's House, The Italian Straw Hat, a Labiche farce, and Vayishlach, Vayir'a the second part of author-director Rina Yerushalmi's foray into the Bible.

Levin and Sobol have contributed to the Haifa '97/98 season too, as well as Orli Castel-Blum, Dani Horowitz, and their debut plays by Guy Cohen and Meir Gan-Or.

His play is Ben-Gurion, not about the country's first prime minister but about a Romanian immigrant family in the Haifa transit camp that bore his name.

Cohen's play is called simply Yamuni, a look at the hunter and the hunted.

Sobol himself is directing a revival of his own Ghetto which premiered there 10 years ago and Levin will direct his Going through the Dark.

Tilting his chin at the elements, Oded Kotler, Haifa Theater's general manager, has also included not one but two Oscar Wilde-based plays, his poetic drama Salome and Rami Rosen's Israelized version of An Ideal Husband or The Palestinian Canal. There's also Isaac Bashevis Singer's gothic Jewish melodrama Teibele and Her Demon.

Haifa Theater is still struggling. The Cameri is riding high, but both are only as good as their next show. That's showbiz.

World music from India

By MICHAEL AJZENSTADT

He shares a family name with the most renowned Indian musician of our times, but this Shankar has little else in common with Ravi Shankar.

The name Shankar derives from "one of the Indian gods, Shiva. It's a very common name, like John," says the musician in a phone interview from his Los Angeles home. So why doesn't he use a first name? "It has 26 letters and people always spell it wrong. I tried it before and it didn't work," he says. In fact he'd "rather not" reveal either the name or his age. But he does talk about the amazing musical instrument which will feature in his forthcoming tour here. (Shankar plays this Friday at the Tel Aviv Performing Arts Center and the following night at the Israel Museum in Jerusalem.)

His major instrument is his specially handmade 10-stringed stereo-phonetic double violin which he designed almost two decades ago. "It was when Zappa produced my record and I suddenly realized that on the road it's difficult to have many instruments such as a double bass with me."

"So I planned to get one instrument that will have it all, from bass to viol. I finished it in '78 and used

Shankar: 'Spontaneity and feeling are the most important things in music.'

it when playing with Phil Collins in his first hit, "In the Air."

Shankar is an advocate of world music. "When I came to America in 1969, world music was not that open, people were not that interested in studying other music. But slowly it changed. People should have a chance to listen to different music and then decide what they like. People are afraid to cross boundaries."

As to an exact definition of world music, Shankar says that "it's any kind of music. And the only thing I request of my audience is to have an open mind and be ready to share music with me."

Admirers of Shankar's brand of world music include musicians such as Phil Collins, Peter Gabriel, John McLaughlin, Zakir Hussain, Marianne Faithfull, George Harrison, Van Morrison and many others with whom he has performed and recorded. "Doing it with friends is always great. Now I'm finishing a new disc and Phil Collins sings on it."

Shankar began his musical life at a very early age. "My father was a great singer and my mom was also a singer. They started teaching me at age two. My father heard a lot of world music and pretty early I realized I wanted to be a musician. I never liked school and my father wanted me to be an engineer. When I left India in 1969, it was because I didn't want to study for six years. I knew I had to do music. I didn't want to be stuck there. I hated college, so I went away."

Shankar admits that as far as he is concerned "spontaneity and feeling are the most important things in music." And he adds that "I believe I haven't even started accomplishing only 0.1 percent of what I want to do. It has, nothing to do with fame and money, I have lots of ideas."

The Oscars vs. Larry Flynt

Larry Flynt planned to spend Monday night at the Oscars, where the film based on his life has been nominated for two awards. But Flynt, the mogul behind Hustler magazine, learned last week that he hasn't got a ticket for the Academy Awards show at the Shrine Auditorium. Flynt blamed Sony, the parent of Columbia Pictures, which released the film The People vs. Larry Flynt. Director Miles Forman and Woody Harrelson, who plays Flynt in the movie, are up for Oscars.

Although tickets are scarce, Flynt noted that real-life subjects of nominated films traditionally have been invited. "I just think what Columbia has done is real cheesy," he said. AP

Honey, we shrank the screen

Walt Disney Pictures has just released Honey, We Shrunk Ourselves, the newest entry in the popular comedy series starring Rick Moranis as the shrink-happy scientist Wayne Szalinski. But don't expect a cinema release for this Honey. The sequel to 1989's Honey, I Shrunk the Kids and 1992's Honey, I Blew Up the Baby made its big premiere Tuesday at US video outlets. LA Times

Shaker rattles and rolls

In a plea to overturn Israel's ban on his music, British rock artist Crispian Mills, better known as Kula Shaker, has written an open letter to the Israeli press, apologizing for statements he made about the swastika to the British music magazine NME in its March 3 issue. "I love the swastika. It's a brilliant image, it symbolizes peace and the sun and illumination," he told the magazine. Now he explains that "the swastika originated from the ancient vedic culture of India and in its original form it is the antithesis of the demonic and monstrous Nazi atrocities." Daniel J. Chalfen

Nelly Ahar won the NIS 10,000 first prize at last week's TheaterNetto monodrama festival for her performance in Josephine, the story of a woman so alienated she befriends a carp. Certificates of merit went to actors Rosina Kambo and Jonathan Tshochri for their performances, respectively, in Along the Walls, a Holocaust memoir, and Mr. V, about convicted spy Mordechai Vanunu. Ten young ballet dancers will participate in the finals of the Mia Arbatova Classical Ballet Competition which had its preliminaries last Saturday at the Suzanne Dellal Dance Center. There were 23 entrants from all over the country aged between 14 and 23, including two male dancers, one of whom has gone through to the finals.

These are at the end of May and the winners will receive cash prizes ranging from NIS 1,500 to 6,000, as well as a statue donated by the Mia Arbatova Trust. Arbatova (1911-90) immigrated from her native Riga in 1938 and taught three generations of dancers, including Nira Paz, who initiated the competition eight years ago. Helen Kaye

The 'Bill and Boris' summit

Last week's meeting of the US and Russian presidents in Helsinki was a far cry from the drama-packed summits of the Cold War days. In that at least, it demonstrated how far international relations have traveled since then—president Ronald Reagan's famous "evil empire" speech, that seemed to mark a new and hopeless twist to superpower nuclear rivalry and Star Wars arms racing.

Even in their most heated exchanges of differing viewpoints, the smiles and first-name banter rarely left the lips of Bill Clinton and Boris Yeltsin and journalists quickly dubbed it the "Bill and Boris" summit. The issue of NATO expansion dominated the summit. Yet even this bone of contention seemed more theatrical than substantial and, despite the presence of an obligatory stumbling block, the two leaders covered a substantial area of political and economic ground.

Though somewhat overshadowed by the NATO debate, Clinton and Yeltsin's agreement in principle to negotiate a new arms-control treaty was a major achievement. It is easy to forget, now that multiple-headed nuclear missiles are no longer targeted on the world's major cities, that these dangerous strategic warheads are still very much operational and that reductions agreed by Yeltsin and George Bush four years ago have still not been implemented.

Relations between these nuclear superpowers are much too far-reaching to be laughed off because the present leaders get on so well. Chuckling Bill and Boris will not be with us forever and there are potential political leaders in Russia—perhaps even in the United States and Europe—who could quickly wipe the grins off all our faces.

Russian Communist Party leader Gennady Zyuganov called the summit a "crushing defeat," and compared it to the 1919 Treaty of Versailles that ended World War I and imposed the humiliating conditions on Germany that allowed the Nazis to tap national anger and rise to power. It is easy to dismiss such talk as domestic political rhetoric, but no one needs reminding that nationalism is a potent and resilient force that has outlived more than one utopian ideology. Nuclear-armed nationalism remains the greatest potential threat to the peace of the planet.

So, theatrical or not, the row over the expansion of NATO eastwards seems one of the more pointless conflicts of the post-Cold War era. The West still seems extraordinarily insensitive to Russian objections on this score and the arguments for boosting this former anti-Soviet alliance to new powers remain unconvincing. Obviously, Yeltsin strongly denied that he had made important military concessions to Washington and NATO. But the fact is he all but threw in the towel, because the eastward expansion of the military alliance is now inevitable. Russia won more financial help and an image-lifting invitation to join the Group of Seven industrialized nations, which will become a Summit of Eight.

The two leaders settled for a formula of words, as is the way of such conferences. Yeltsin abandoned his bid to gain a veto over the NATO expansion and accepted a "politically binding" treaty to regulate relations between Russia and NATO. Since Yeltsin continued to speak of the NATO plans as a mistake, it can only be hoped the "piece of paper" he brought back to Moscow will not come back to haunt himself and Clinton. NATO will go ahead despite Russia's official reservations and Clinton made it clear Russia will have only "a voice" and not a veto in NATO decisions that nudge Russia's borders.

Given the fact that his domestic critics will see Yeltsin as having accepted vague assurances about a potentially serious buildup of Western forces on Russia's frontiers, Western concessions to Yeltsin will seem less than generous in the eyes of his countrymen—pie in the sky set against guns on the ground.

Russia gained some economic breathing space with an agreed delay until 2007 in implementing the destruction of missiles required under the Start I and Start II treaties. None of this is likely to cause excitement in the cafes of Moscow and neither were any details of financial aid for Russia's troubled economy spelled out. All in all it is hard to see how these complex and unsexy agreements can be made to play politically in Russia when set against the passionate pride of the Russian soul in the country's strength and importance.

American staffers at the summit could scarcely conceal their glee over getting almost everything they wanted from the Russian side. "We have concluded a major summit in which there was historic progress in European security, nuclear arms reduction and economic cooperation with Russia," said Secretary of State Madeleine Albright.

Perhaps to deflect media attention from the smaller basket of goodies he was bringing home, Yeltsin launched one of his unexpected policy trial balloons at the close of the summit when he declared Russia wanted to join the European Union. A shocked Brussels said Yeltsin's words had been "noted" and a distinct shudder could be felt from most of the union's capitals. At present Russia probably has the same chance of joining Europe as the European states have of joining the Russian Federation. But the statement was one last farewell bonus for the departing US presidential team. Yeltsin appeared to have decided to prefer the European club to the North Atlantic one, and that will be Brussels' problem rather than Washington's.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

REALISTIC VIEW OF THE GOLAN

Sir, I refer to Mr. Abba Eban's letter of February 28 on what he calls "Transforming events" that have affected his views since 1971. He lists Prime Minister Begin's surrender of all of Sinai to secure peace and the proposals of a peace treaty with Syria on the basis of the international boundary, first in 1967 by Eshkol-Dayan-Begin, then again by Rabin-Peres in 1996.

Mr. Eban should have included in his list of "transforming events" Syria's invasion of Israel territory, together with Egypt, in 1973—their third attempt to put an end to the "Zionist entity"—and also the use in the first two of the Golan Heights as a shooting gallery and springboard for its armed assaults.

In the Middle East, the record of respect for treaty obligations by Arab Moslem signatories among themselves has been undistinguished. On what does Mr. Eban base his hope for lasting Syrian respect in relations with infidels? The graves of our soldiers and airmen who fell on the Golan in three Syrian wars of aggression, and of the civilians killed by Syrian artillery firing from Golan into our villages in the Jordan Valley below, should serve us as so many memorials calling for caution and distrust. As long as we hold that territory, President Assad will respect his signature on the armistice agreement between the two countries at least there.

Of course, a solid peace agreement is an ideal for all of us. But the signature of an unscrupulous Syrian strongman is an unsafe substitute for the security of a strategic position. As Talleyrand, a foreign minister of long experience, put it: "What idealists break, realists cannot repair."

TOO GROTESQUE

Sir, I sincerely hope that the charges against the head of Kamit Insurance (the government insurance company responsible for compensating uninsured accident victims, hit-and-run victims, etc.) as reported in your paper of February 28 are unfounded. It would be too grotesque that the state's highest paid employee would find that NIS 67,000 a month is not enough for him to live on, especially when victims of road carnage are forced to go through years of anguish in the process of extracting compensation from this company.

Badgered in court in a sickening process designed to humiliate and intimidate, the bereaved families are invariably made to feel guilty of either losing a loved one or being the care-giver to a permanently disabled family member. Often traumatized so badly the bereaved and injured can never find the motivation to return to a productive working life, they do not have the mental strength to endure years of outrageously protracted proceedings.

This country has far more than its share of tragedy, yet surely road deaths are the most senseless of all. The victims are not heroes of the state and their plight has the lowest priority with the politicians. It is simply a non-issue on every party platform.

CHARLES' ISLAMIC VALUES

Sir, You recently reported that Prince Charles of England had been criticized in Britain for becoming overly pro-Islamic and asking for "Islamic values" to be instilled in British children.

I wonder if the Prince has considered what would be the practical and physical implications of his exhortation, if those same values were to be applied to himself. I very much doubt if he did, otherwise his extra-marital peccadilloes with another man's wife would have probably resulted, according to "Islamic values," in members of his former wife's family emulating him for his infidelity (not a welcome situation for an heir to the kingdom); he would also have realized that any visits which his paramour, Camilla Parker-Bowles, could make to the royal properties would have been, to quote the immortal soliloquy of the late Sir Stanley Holloway, "with 'er 'ead tucked underneath 'er arm'."

HUSSEIN'S HYPOCRISY

Sir, Certainly no one can blame King Hussein for the actions of one crazed Jordanian soldier, but his visits of condolence set a new high in hypocrisy matched only by Binayamin Netanyahu's cravenness in permitting them.

I see no reason to doubt what the survivors of the massacre reported: no attempt was made to interfere with the murderer until his second magazine jammed and Jordanian soldiers refused to allow Israeli soldiers and policemen to treat and evacuate casualties for nearly 40 critical minutes. As monarch and commander in chief of the Jordanian Armed Forces, Hussein bears direct responsibility for both these acts of criminal callousness. If his soldiers acted the way they did, it is because Hussein's general orders showed them the way.

True partners

GERSHON BASKIN, ZAKARIA AL QAQ

No, this is not peace. Peace and terror cannot dwell together. But the legacy of war, hatred and fear makes it difficult for us to adopt a peace-making mind-set. Yet it must be done. Israelis and Palestinians have responded to each other in the language of animosity, each side enlisting its archive of suffering to and final status. Both must undertake not to act unilaterally. Both must understand that failure on their part will engender more violence and suffering on both sides.

Both must realize that while muscle-flexing may boost the ego, it doesn't protect lives. In striving for peace, Israel must use its strength as an asset.

Israel's security depends on the Palestinians' security, not only on the strength of the IDF and its deterrent power. Israel will not feel the real meaning of peace and security until mutual interests have been created.

Israel's most important concern is security; the Palestinians experience their security as bound up with national honor and dignity. The more Israel respects that, the more security it will have. Only then will the Palestinians become true partners in the fight against terrorism.

Once the Palestinians are independent players on a level playing field that provides them with the political will to fight the enemies of peace—in other words, once they realize they have too much to lose—that will be the turning point.

Time is of the essence. It is in Israel's interest to make more concessions in favor of a faster agreement rather than hold out for as long as possible until the Palestinian side collapses in compromise.

These negotiations will be much more complex and difficult than any until now, which makes it vital that several key principles be fully understood by both sides:

* The Palestinians must be seen as full and equal partners.

Dry Bones

* The final status talks must produce results which are really final, and not more interim measures.

* The final agreement must create good-neighborly relations based on openness and cooperation, not on closure and separation.

* Israel must take an interest in the development of the Palestinian economy.

* The agreement must be speedy, answering both Israel's need for real security and the Palestinian need for real national honor and dignity.

* Israel must encourage the Palestinians to adopt a more democratic regime, for their good and Israel's.

These negotiating principles, leavened by mutual respect, may be the only hope that these travels on the peace road have not entered a final dead end.

Forget the finger-pointing, and be practical

AARON LERNER

When a 28-year-old father of four smashed Israel's operative profile of a suicide bomber in Tel Aviv last Friday, reactions were predictable. Some ministers called for a halt in negotiations. The prime minister talked tough without going into specifics. And the rest of the world pointed a finger at Israel for building on Har Homa.

As we approach final status talks with the Palestinians, there will be more and more good excuses for attacking Israel. As Netanyahu's senior advisor David Bar-Ilan wrote in an editorial in this newspaper on March 25 last year, "The US would like to see an Israel the Arab regimes can live with... at the very least, an Israeli withdrawal to the 1949 armistice lines on all fronts, and the establishment of a Palestinian state with half of Jerusalem as its capital."

When terror strikes Israel as it refuses to fulfill America's hopes, the news will be received with considerable understanding alongside the standard condolences. So will the spectacle of Palestinian security forces acting more to shield Palestinian rioters than to stop them as they attack Israeli troops, using everything from bricks to firebombs.

This attitude is nothing new. In White House Years Henry Kissinger wrote almost three decades ago: "We [Americans] tend to lean over backwards to avoid the conclusion that the Arabs are violating."

I would go on and add that the world, by and large, doesn't care about violations—unless, that is, they have some impact on that illusive and elusive dynamic called "the peace process."

More curiously, Arab violations don't really seem to matter to Israel either. If they did, Binayamin Netanyahu would never have pushed through approval of the first further redeployment. After all, as he complained in a letter to President Clinton last week, the Palestinians have done nothing to fulfill their obligation regarding reciprocity.

Should Israel stop the talks? Stopping them for a day, a week, or even for months is no solution. It will only postpone the problem and damage Israel's image—especially if it doesn't present a clearly measurable condition for the resumption of talks.

When I spoke with MK Uzi

Landau, chairman of the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee, shortly after Friday's attack, he specified "immediate extradition to Israel of at least 10 of the terrorist murderers whose extradition Israel has already filed for."

But efforts to get ministers or the premier interested in the idea have so far been fruitless.

The spokeswoman at the Justice Ministry—which has yet to submit even a single extradition request since Netanyahu's election—asked me, incredulously, "What has the bombing got to do with the extradition of terrorists?"

With this attitude, it's no surprise that an IMRA-commissioned Gallup Poll on March 13 and 16 found that only 27.3 percent of adult Israeli Jews believe the Netanyahu government exerts enough pressure on the Palestinians to honor their obligations as laid down in the Oslo accords.

Clearly it's time for a different approach, focused not on finger-pointing but on problem-solving.

Israel must negotiate on the working assumption that the Palestinians aren't going to get any better

Palestinians were Belgians, for example, but we know now that joint operations with the Palestinians don't go well under pressure—so much so that the joint patrols are regularly canceled when tension rises.

Zeidan also says that Israel agreed not to have the IDF patrol the perimeter of the airport, but will rely on closed-circuit TV.

If the PA were committed to preventing the smuggling of illegal weapons and other contraband into the autonomy, there might be some logic in this. But since the PA itself is involved in massive weapons smuggling, TV cameras alone simply won't suffice. Israel needs complete security control of the airport. And, in light of the potential for unilateral Palestinian action, we need a force large enough to face any challenge.

Arrangements in Hebron will also have to change.

The current agreement put Jewish neighborhoods cheek by jowl with Palestinian-controlled areas, on the assumption that Palestinian security forces would prevent mobs from reaching the Jewish areas. This weekend showed they didn't.

In fact, at least one Palestinian policeman actually joined the mob, picking up a tear-gas canister and throwing it back in the direction of our soldiers.

Reports from the scene say calm was restored only when the Palestinians were warned that in 30 minutes, Israel would send forces into the Arab H1 area near Beit Hadassah to quell the rioting.

To ensure Jewish security in Hebron, therefore, Israel will require security control of a considerably larger portion of the city, including areas looking down on the Jewish neighborhoods. Oslo 2 provides for a reassessment of prevailing security arrangements.

The same principle applies everywhere. Instead of hoping that Palestinian compliance with the accords will improve, Israel should insist on arrangements which safeguard the security of the state if Palestinian noncompliance remains at the current level—or gets worse.

In practical terms this probably means a dramatic change in the scope of the security areas Israel will require. Problematic? Maybe—but anything else would be building a world based on what should be, rather than what very well could be.

America may not like it. But it is Israel that faces the music when wishful thinking goes sour.

"If you lack the power to protect yourself, it is unlikely that in the absence of a compelling interest, anyone else will be willing to do it for you."

Who wrote that? Binayamin Netanyahu, in A Place Among the Nations.

We've become catastrophe freaks

HELEN MOTRO

Minutes after Friday's café bombing, my mother's phone in Tel Aviv rang with the news—via her sister in Montreal, who had just heard about it on CNN.

During the Gulf War, it wasn't uncommon to be informed about a missile attack on us before the sirens went off here by relatives abroad who saw the news flash on TV, and ran to the phone.

Immediately after an "incident," telephone lines jam, despite official pleas to keep lines free for emergency calls. On Friday, cellular phones all over Tel Aviv started ringing, as frantic relatives tried to hear the voices of family members out in the sunny afternoon.

Each explosion reverberates through the country. Strangers stop each other on the streets. Within minutes, everybody seems to have heard. If our surroundings look the slightest bit out of the ordinary, we jump to the conclusion that "something has happened." It usually has.

It was from noticing the woman in the adjacent car shaking her head from side to side and staring at her radio that I understood right away I had better turn mine on. That's how I learned about the massacre at Naharayim.

My mother meets her elderly friends in a Tel Aviv café a few blocks away from Ahropo on Reiness Street. My mother-in-law's apartment on Dizengoff Street faces the corner where the Number 5 bus blew up.

Driving to Jerusalem a few days later, I was suddenly frightened by a road that looked "too empty." My hand immediately reached out to flick on the radio, which informed me that the highway was about to be shut down to make way for My daughter and I were at the peace rally where Yitzhak Rabin was killed outside the Tel Aviv municipality. And my husband was due at the optician's in Dizengoff Center on the afternoon the bomb detonated there.

I don't think we are exceptional. Everywhere you hear stories of connections near or far to terror. It used to be said that every family in Israel was touched by having a fallen soldier; now the front has expanded to include restaurant tables with white umbrellas.

The media has stepped in to become our anchor. Along with the ambulances, they materialize out of nowhere to cover the gruesome stories, switching from the scene of the attack to hospital emergency rooms, to spot interviews with spectators, mayors, rescue workers.

Continuous coverage fills the need of everybody greedy to swallow the awful details. We have become catastrophe freaks, hungry for fact that a burned six-month-old baby wore a clown suit, or that one of those killed was a social worker who herself helped comfort families of previous attacks.

Shortly after the bombing, a TV reporter pointed his microphone at an injured man lying in a hospital bed, and broadcast a five-minute interview before the man was wheeled into surgery.

Events seem to have overtaken personalities, snowballing toward a macabre finale.

Neither Netanyahu nor Arafat nor Hussein nor Mubarak, nor even Clinton appear in control. Is there anybody alive big enough to make a gesture sufficiently magnanimous to revive the fading momentum toward peace?

If not, our political direction might just as well emanate from the satirical puppets belting out their doggerel from the TV sets in our living rooms.

For some, indeed, the Horrorfilm's dark vision has already become today's Delphic oracle.

There Is No Chinese James Bond. So Far.

BEIJING
In the spy-versus-spy atmosphere of the cold war, countless millions of readers everywhere followed the modern world's Great Game, both the reality of it and the fiction of it. The espionage business was — a culture, the culture of spying and spies, their codes, their honor or lack thereof, their secret victories, their spectacular failures, their wonderful gadgets and even their sexual dalliances out there on the edge.

From the pants-wetting pseudo-spy in the movie "True Lies," whose come-on line to girls was, "Fear is not an option," to the soulful, midlife meandering of George Smiley in John LeCarre's novels, to the real-life drama of the Bay of Pigs and Aldrich Ames's betrayal of his country, this culture of espionage has enthralled and entertained as much as it has wreaked havoc on its participants and plenty of innocent bystanders.

But in this rich tapestry of the real and the made up, the spymasters of the People's Republic of China have been as gray as an ill-fitting Mao jacket.

Now China's spies are suddenly on stage, thrust forward by revelations suggesting that the Chinese Government may have targeted members of Congress to gain influence through illicit campaign contributions, or that its operatives may have tried to penetrate the White House itself by insinuating themselves into the Clinton campaign's huge effort to raise money.

Though the investigation into Democratic fundraising has yet to put a name or a face to him, there may be a Chinese version of James Bond out there waiting to be discovered as the man with a license to do lunch, armed with a golden Rolodex full of White House phone numbers as he moves in the world of shadowy Indonesian tycoons, up-and-down restaurateurs and the Little Rock boys.

Everyone an Informer

But on to what we know about China and its spies. Though overshadowed during the West's struggle against Soviet expansionism, Chinese espionage has a history dating back almost as far as Chinese civilization itself. The first Mata Hari, in fact, may have been a beautiful Chinese concubine named Xi Shi (pronounced shyee shur) during the Spring and Autumn Period (770 to 476 B.C.). Dispatched by the cunning ruler of the Yue Kingdom in a successful campaign to vanquish the Wu Kingdom, she may have been the first spy to prove the theory that a knock-em-dead courtesan can so distract an enemy that he may be blinded to preparations for war.

Maybe China's spies targeted U.S. politics. Maybe they didn't. But who are they?

The art of war, so cultivated by the Chinese, is suffused with the trade craft of espionage.

In 1949, Mao's Communists took power with the help of master spies like Li Kenong and Qian Zhuangfei, who had penetrated Chiang Kai-shek's "wireless administration bureau" in Shanghai, where they could read the Nationalists' mail and protect the Communist cause. Once in power, Mao created a new society based on a culture of mass espionage, in which self-criticism, the very art of being Maoist, provided the means to monitor and control the masses. In Mao's China, everyone became an informer and enforcer of a single standard of behavior. The instinct to inform and report to "the leaders" remains powerful today in China, and recruiting spies here to work for the glory of the motherland has never been very difficult, many Chinese say.

China's C.I.A. is the Ministry of State Security. The country's top spy, Jia Chunwang (pronounced jyah chwyn-WAENG), is a 59-year-old native of Beijing who graduated in 1964 from Qinghua University — China's M.I.T. — with a degree in physics. While there have been six C.I.A. directors in the last five years, Mr. Jia was appointed to his post in 1985 and has been on the job ever since. He is conversant in English, is said to admire the C.I.A. and is so popular among Communist Party leaders that he was a contender last year for Mayor of Beijing, one of the most visible political jobs in the country.

Supreme Leader, Pigeon in Chief

LYING in bed at night, eyes wide open, his busted knee throbbing, having just clicked off Letterman after the umpteenth pasty-white-thigh joke and tossed aside the Washington Post's latest smoldering editorial about his ethics, President Clinton surely must be asking himself: Did I really want to be President this bad?

Richard Nixon was the father of special prosecutors, and he only racked up two of them during his Presidency. Mr. Clinton already has four, one short of a royal flush, and the Senate last week urged Attorney General Janet Reno to complete the hand by demanding another one, this time to poke into Democratic fund-raising. Congress is gearing up for more hearings. The Lincoln Bedroom is a national joke.

The Supreme Court is pondering when Mr. Clinton should be sued for supposedly dropping his pants.

Even some people who normally enjoy tormenting him are wondering aloud whether the scandal machine has lost its speed governor. When did it become standard procedure to subject the President of the United States to gossip about womanizing? Or bumper-to-bumper corruption inquiries by the Republicans in Congress? Or endless accusations about some land deal everyone else forgot years ago? What sane leader would put up with such swill?

Those are good questions. The answers are (a) 1789 and (b) George Washington.

Modern political memory does not extend much beyond Watergate, so it is tempting to conclude that the Presidency went from supreme honor to hideous personal embarrassment and potential criminal liability after Mr. Nixon brought his special brand of meanness to the job.

History suggests otherwise. Washington probably lay in bed too, gums throbbing from his ill-fitting false teeth, and wondered why he ever took the lousy job. Ditto Andrew Jackson and his throbbing bullet wound from an old duel, Zachary Taylor and his Mexican War flesh wound, Rutherford B. Hayes and his brace of Civil War scars, and so on. All these pigeons went into office beloved and respected and, innocently or deservedly, got caught in the scandal meat-grinder.

"Certainly there have been White House scandals throughout American history," said Suzanne Garment, an American Enterprise Institute scholar who wrote the book on the topic ("Scandal: The Culture of Mistrust in American Politics," Times Books, 1991). "It's very hard to say how you compare these things across time, because the means of communication have changed so much and there have been huge shifts in the nature of partisanship — in both directions."

The World

Albania Is Cast Adrift

As Albania falls apart, refugees are fleeing to Italy, where a policeman guards a boatload of refugees at the harbor in Brindisi.

By JANE PERLEZ

WHEN James A. Baker 3d visited this dilapidated capital as the American Secretary of State six years ago, hundreds of thousands of Albanians thronged the streets, and those who could get close enough kissed his car. While here, Mr. Baker met with the opposition leader Sali Berisha, a tall, ruddy-faced heart surgeon with leonine hair and a tempestuous personality who had been anointed as the man Washington would do business with.

Mr. Berisha went on to win the elections Albania hoped he would win, and to install a semblance of democracy. Then — more to the point — he went on to provide a quiet base for America's efforts to calm the volcano erupting next door in what had been Yugoslavia.

Now, little more than five years later, Mr. Berisha's rule has been discredited as a sham democracy in the service of greed, and Albania has collapsed in anarchy. But the crisis next door seems in remission, and so the rest of the world has until now maintained its distance. Certainly, nobody is rushing to prop up Mr. Berisha — or his country. Quite the contrary. Mr. Berisha's former backers in America are calling for him to quit, while offering Albania little else.

It seems reminiscent of other crises in other strategic places — Central America, Afghanistan, Zaire — where America would pick an ally, promote him as a lover of freedom and rely on him to help guard the Free World's far-flung ramparts. When the cold war ended, the truth would emerge about these allies, and their countries would be left more or less alone to pick through the wreckage that these lovers of freedom had wrought.

All this was supposed to have ended with the cold war, but then came Bosnia. And now, Albania.

Stability

Mr. Berisha, the argument in his favor went, was more than an internal reformer for Albania; he offered stability in the Balkans. What his American supporters seem to have missed was that he had been indelibly shaped by the Marxist-Leninist regime of his Communist predecessor, Enver Hoxha; today it can be admitted that, as one American official put it, he turned out to be "a crackpot dictator." In other words, just another Balkan strongman who, in his case, served Western interests during the Bosnian war and can now be counted as expendable.

In the beginning, the match between what Washington wanted and what Mr. Berisha was offering seemed ideal.

Shut out from the world during xenophobic Communism, Albanians had long hungered for all things American: blue jeans, Coca-Cola, women's makeup, Hollywood videos. Mr. Berisha was elected in 1992 after a campaign in which America's then-Ambassador, William Ryerson, appeared on his campaign platforms.

Mr. Berisha espoused free market policies, and once-drag Albania soon began to feel like an exotic bazaar (even though many of the imports were smuggled goods). A country that had only one fax machine in 1991 soon had mobile phones and imported cars. The International Monetary Fund gave Mr. Berisha glowing reports for clamping down on inflation and encouraging privatization, even as it ignored the corruption that was coming to pervade the economy.

Meanwhile, as Yugoslavia cracked wide open, Mr. Berisha, who comes from the rugged northern part of Albania near the border of Kosovo, promised to be useful in containing the war. Kosovo is an Albanian enclave in Serbia where the Albanians are kept in check by a repressive Serbian police force, and even before Bosnia exploded it seemed likely to become a nightmarish flashpoint for ethnic hatreds. So Mr. Berisha repeatedly did Washington's bidding to help calm Kosovo, using his influence there to insure that its Albanians did not challenge the status quo.

A large number of guns have been distributed or looted amid the spread of anarchy in Albania. A rebel in the southern town of Memaliaj uses his assault rifle as a pool cue.

An Albanian rebel test-fires an assault rifle from a small boat in Saranda, in the south.

And as the war in Bosnia intensified, Mr. Berisha proved more than happy to have his country used as a doormat by the Pentagon. American unmanned spy planes were based at an airfield in the northern region of Lezhe for their missions to identify NATO bombing targets. American warships had access to the Albanian waters of the Adriatic Sea that the Soviets had once used to flank Marshal Tito in Yugoslavia.

For all of this, Mr. Berisha's price was low: About $30 million of nonlethal military equipment like used trucks and uniforms was sent by the Pentagon. Military officers were offered training in the United States. (Several defected.)

Advice

Although Albania was so backward, it seemed such a desirable piece of real estate during the Bosnia war that the United States and Europe treated it like a colony. Influence in the Government was divided up: the United States put advisers in the presidency and the Ministries of Finance and Defense, Italy advised the Privatization Ministry, and Germany helped out at the Ministry of Interior. The European Union poured in about $800 million in assistance, making Albania the recipient of the highest per-capita aid of any country in Eastern Europe.

While they still felt they needed Mr. Berisha, his Western benefactors ignored his authoritarian habits. Six months after his election, Mr. Berisha fired his attorney general for opposing a law that gave the police wide discretion in searching homes. Journalists were harassed by the secret police, the main opposition leader was convicted of fraud in a trial that human rights advocates consider suspect, the ruling party was purged, and officials who didn't toe the Berisha line were dismissed from the courts, the army, even the Institute of Fine Arts.

Last May, Mr. Berisha went a step too far and blatantly rigged parliamentary elections, then sent police to beat up protesters. The United States complained publicly, but by that stage it was easy to do. The fighting in Bosnia had been declared over, and the need to have Mr. Berisha on Washington's side had diminished, at least for the moment.

Officials in Washington also warned the Berisha Government that the pyramid schemes in which most Albanians had invested money would collapse, wreaking havoc in the economy. Even so, few in Washington seem to have foreseen just how bad the wreckage would be — how many Albanians, such dreamers of the American dream, would be left even poorer than when they had emerged from Communism. Nor did anyone predict that Mr. Berisha's misrule would ignite the popular insurgencies that have left the country such a thoroughly disorganized armed camp.

"The irony is that Berisha was supported as a factor of stability in the region," said Fred Abrahams, a research associate at Human Rights Watch in New York. "And now we have the greatest threat to stability in the region since the signing of the Dayton peace accords."

Guess Who's Giving the Voters a Choice

By ELAINE SCIOLINO

IT is not what one might expect from Iran.

On May 23, all Iranian citizens over the age of 15 — both male and female — are eligible to cast their ballots in the most significant contest for the Presidency in Iran's 18-year-old revolution.

Officially, none of the candidates has been approved and the campaign is still weeks away.

But the front runner, using his power base as speaker of the Parliament, is making promises to improve the economy, keep away from the United States and enforce stricter Islamic law. The leading underdog, wooing women and teen-agers for their votes, is pledging more personal freedoms, more jobs and no more male supremacy. And eight other would-be candidates are struggling to be heard.

This is Presidential politics, Iranian-style: tough, nasty, confusing and full of alliance-building, horse-trading and mud-slinging. And all of it falls within the confines of the Islamic Republic.

Repression and Debate

Is it democracy? Not by Western standards. But it is not the dictatorial system that the State Department has called it either.

Rather, Iran is at the same time a country of brutal and unnerving repression, and one with flashes of surprisingly open political debate. It is a combination designed to keep an elite acceptable to the Islamic Republic in power, and the population in check.

"There is space — but only restricted space — for political competition in Iran," said Shaul Bakhash, a historian who writes extensively on Iran. "The competition is limited to candidates and groups acceptable to the regime, and outsiders are not allowed to seriously participate in elections or the political process. I call it the politics of the ruling elite."

The reason there is a Presidential election at all is that President Ali Akbar Hashemi Rafsanjani has already served the maximum two four-year terms allowed under Iran's Constitution.

For months now, the leading candidate has been Ali Akbar Nateq-Noori, the speaker of Iran's Parliament and a mid-level clergyman with unimpressive religious credentials. Just a few months ago, he seemed a shoo-in.

But at least one other candidate has emerged as a serious contender: Mohammad Khatami, a cleric who served as Minister of Islamic Guidance for a decade until he was forced to resign for allowing too much freedom in the press, publishing and the arts.

Still, it isn't just anyone who can run for president. The Council of Guardians, a body that is dominated by the clerics and supervises elections, must approve all candidates. In last year's parliamentary election, the council disqualified about 40 percent of the 5,000 would-be candidates. In the last Presidential election, in 1993, more than 100 candidates tried to run; only three eventually did. And although Iran's spiritual leader, Ayatollah Ali Khamenei, has declared himself neutral in the coming presidential election, no candidate who did not meet with his approval could run.

Still, as the balloting draws near, what looks like a campaign of genuine issues and candidates is playing out.

Officially, political parties are banned in Iran, but clearly identifiable factions with clearly identifiable views are not. Mr. Nateq-Noori has the endorsement of the Society of Combatant Clergy, a political grouping he heads that is dominated by socially conservative clerics and supported by those bazaar merchants who care about free foreign trade but not necessarily about foreign investment. That support brings with it the power of a well-organized political machine with the resources to get out the vote: the nationwide network of mosques.

There are no reliable opinion polls in Iran, but a three-week tour of the country last December — including interviews with dozens of workers, students, academics, teen-agers and retirees — suggested that there is a widely held view that Mr. Nateq-Noori would only make Iran's economic problems worse and that he by no means enjoys the popular support that Mr. Rafsanjani does.

The Challenger

Enter Mr. Khatami. He has the backing of two strong groups on opposite ends of the political spectrum: the left-leaning Coalition of the Imam's Line, which supports state control of the economy and more equal distribution of wealth; and, if some of Iran's newspapers are to be believed, all but one member of the Servants of Construction, a group that opposes state control of the economy, favors more foreign investment and better relations with the West, and is aligned with Mr. Rafsanjani. (Mr. Rafsanjani himself has vowed not to endorse any candidate.) Mr. Khatami is also popular among university students and intellectuals. Teen-agers are important, since about half the population of Iran has been born since the revolution.

Even though the campaign does not officially start for weeks, Mr. Nateq-Noori is crisscrossing the country in an effort to boost his strong lead. He traveled recently from town to town in his native Mazandaran province, visiting hospitals and schools, inaugurating factories, bakeries and even buildings — trailed all along the way by crews from the state television, which extensively aired his pronouncements every night.

The fact that he is acting as if he has already been elected has incensed his political opponents. "Why is the television showing him every hour on his trip and broadcasting an anthem written especially for him?" one reader asked in a call-in complaint column in the daily Salav, which favors Mr. Khatami's candidacy. "Can television still claim it is not taking sides for the presidency?"

Another reader asked: "Please tell me why is it the speaker of the Parliament is the one inaugurating projects and not the President? If the President is busy his deputy should do it."

In their speeches, the candidates say little about the cultural clash of the West or confronting modernization, and much, much more about corruption, inflation, inequality and jobs. Some subjects are not hot for debate — the Arab-Israeli peace process or the death warrant on the author Salman Rushdie, for example. But there have been hints that there is even room for some discussion of Iran's relationship with the United States.

On a campaign stop in Urmia last month, Mohammad Moazzami, a former intelligence Minister and another Presidential hopeful, did not even mention "debt to America" on his list of priorities. And Ibrahim Yazdi, an English-speaking former foreign minister who once had a green card and lived in Texas, announced last Sunday that he favors "normal relations with America" and the creation of a "democratic atmosphere" in Iran.

But, then, Mr. Yazdi's group, the Liberation Movement of Iran, has never been allowed to run in any Iranian election. It's just not considered Islamic enough by Iran's theocrats.

"In a true democracy the people give legitimacy to their government," said Stephen Fairbanks, a visiting scholar at the Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars who is writing a study of Iran's political system. "But Iran's system claims its legitimacy comes from God."

The Nation Advice and Contempt

By ADAM CLYMER

"If the nation is to be denied the right to have as public servants in responsible positions men of his proven character, ability and integrity, then indeed it is the American people who are the losers through this sad episode."

"The worst thing I've ever seen in Washington, from the standpoint of misconduct, distortion and deceitfulness."

THOSE quotations could have come from any one of dozens of Washington insiders last week, bemoaning a new low in Senate confirmation procedures as the cause of Anthony Lake's withdrawal as President Clinton's nominee for Director of Central Intelligence.

But the first came from President Dwight D. Eisenhower, lamenting the defeat of Lewis L. Strauss to be Secretary of Commerce in 1958. The second came from Leonard Garment, once a lawyer for President Richard M. Nixon, after the 1987 defeat of Robert Bork's nomination to the Supreme Court.

One central truth, at least, has not changed about the confirmation procedure. The losers think it stinks.

Another lasting truth is that the process is untidy, even messy, like the rest of American politics. And like the rest of American politics, most of the time it works.

Mr. Lake withdrew after Republicans stalled his nomination for weeks in the hope that something would turn up to defeat him. While they were at it, they smeared him and suggested he was under criminal investigation, and they dilly-dallied in blindingly irrelevant inquiries — asking, for example, about his view of Alger Hiss.

What did turn up, though, turned out to be quite relevant to the fundamental question of whether he had enough talent for management to handle the mismanaged C.I.A. That worried many Senators all along, but it became graphic enough to count when it was connected to fund-raising scandals and attempts to influence the National Security Council, which Mr. Lake headed.

Without analyzing the rights and wrongs of every confirmation battle — Mr. Strauss's haughty manner offended a Senate even more impressed with itself than it is today — it is worth remembering that the process by which the Senate gives or denies its advice and consent to a nomination has spared the country a few public servants it probably didn't need.

Had Abe Fortas become Chief Justice, for example, his 1969 resignation after accusations of influence-peddling would have cast a deeper shadow than did his departure while still an Associate Justice. G. Harrold Carswell, rejected as a Supreme Court nominee, was a racist who was later charged with a "lewd and lascivious act" toward a Tallahassee police officer.

Of course, they were Supreme Court nominees, who have always undergone more severe scrutiny than executive branch appointees. After all, they serve for life.

The system does sometimes thwart a deserving nominee. After Mr. Fortas was defeated for baldly political reasons, Democrats got even by rejecting Clement Haynsworth, a respectable conservative nominee, in what John P. Frank, a liberal lawyer who wrote a book about it, called "a sort of legislative murder in response to an executive assassination."

Delay, Always Delay

Mr. Lake's unhappy experience has something else in common with past battles. It took a long time. Opponents always try to delay, in the hope that a wider public will share their principled objections, or that something devastating will be found. Delay is something of a first principle in the Senate, and nominations are prime targets.

The toll on nominees is not a trivial question, even if their complaints sometimes sound like whining. (All Mr. Strauss would say was, "I leave with confidence that history will be just.") Former Senator John C. Danforth, who almost always voted to confirm nominees of either party, said the scrutiny and leaks that confront nominees "are just terrible." He added: "All of a sudden everything that they have done in an honorable life is in jeopardy, and it's wrong."

Mr. Danforth's most painful example was that of his friend Clarence Thomas. Opposed at first because of his very conservative legal philosophy, Mr. Thomas was on the way to confirmation before opponents dug up Anita Hill, who accused him of sexual harassment. Mr. Thomas prevailed, but was deeply wounded.

So was Mr. Bork, although he was attacked far less on personal grounds than on legal philosophy. His partisans said he was wildly caricatured; his opponents might concede a shade of exaggeration but say he was hung by his own legal writings.

But noting how much has largely stayed the same does not mean that nothing has changed. Like much in American politics today, the nomination process is more given to hyperbole, rudeness and outright lies than it used to be. The tools of attack get harsher. "It's sort of equivalent to an arms race," said Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution. "This time it was the raw F.B.I. files" on Mr. Lake that Senator Richard Shelby of Alabama demanded to see.

The process is also getting longer. In the Johnson Administration, a typical nominee took four to seven weeks to be confirmed. It was 14 weeks in the first Reagan Administration, and it is longer today. Because those averages include the vast majority who are confirmed quickly, the tough ones take much longer, leaving chunks of the Government adrift and nominees embarrassed.

But the biggest difference is in the frequency with which executive appointments produce a fight. Mr. Lake's withdrawal had its precursor in 1976, when Theodore C. Sorensen gave up the chance to be Jimmy Carter's Director of Central Intelligence. Among traditional Cabinet positions, Mr. Strauss's defeat was not repeated until the 1989 defeat of John Tower's nomination as Secretary of Defense.

But the Clinton Administration has seen a series of fights. Zoe Baird was blocked from becoming Attorney General, and there have been battles over sub-Cabinet positions. Ross Baker, a political scientist at Rutgers University, said the tradition of giving Presidents, especially new Presidents, their choice of appointees has eroded during this Administration. More and more, he said, the Senate is not content with a quick look at a nominee's competence and character. It now engages regularly in "ideological vetting," worrying about the beliefs of surrogates general and assistant secretaries like Lami Guinier, Joycelyn Elders, Henry Foster and Roberta Achtenberg.

The process is not neat, and it is certainly not getting neater. But even George Washington had a Supreme Court nomination rejected. As Finley Peter Dunne's Mr. Dooley observed, "Politics ain't beanbag."

This time the departed nominee is Anthony Lake, the President's choice for the C.I.A.

The 42d President is alleged to have sidestepped the draft. The first one was accused not just of military incompetence but of stealing nearly $5,000 from the Continental Army.

And this was the fellow who was first in war, in peace and in his countrymen's hearts.

Nineties America seems to believe that while momentous debates once drove politics, they have given way to smarminess and negativism, an obsession with laundered cash and Gen-Xer Flowers and tabloid sensationalism. Please tell this to Thomas Jefferson, who hired his own attack journal to discredit Hamilton and other Federalists, was hit up for hush money to keep the relationship quiet, and became the target of a media barrage accusing him of trysts with a comely slave, Sally Hemings, when he refused to pay.

The Adultery Tradition

Modern politics has it that adultery became a political issue when Gary Hart was caught with Donna Rice in 1988, or when the Clintons bared their marital problems on "60 Minutes." President Jefferson knew better: his political nemesis, Henry (Light Horse Harry) Lee, forced him into a public confession of his attempts to seduce a good friend's wife.

Is the White House being unfairly tarred because a few — all right, a lot of — overzealous people at the Democratic National Committee tried to nail down the election with questionable cash from foreign millionaires? President Hayes might know: it was said then — and assumed now — that Republican kingmakers bought the electoral votes that put him in the White House in 1876, which Ms. Garment says cast a shadow over politics for the rest of the century.

The list goes on: President Jackson was judged amoral because his wife was not technically divorced from a previous marriage when she married him. President Andrew Johnson became known as a drunk, and all because he was too inebriated to deliver a coherent speech at his swearing-in as Lincoln's Vice President. (The whisky was for medicinal purposes, he said.) U.S. Grant became synonymous with scandal when it was really his loyal appointees who siphoned off Federal whisky taxes and took kickbacks.

Maybe Mr. Clinton can take heart from the fact that others had it rougher. Either that, or he can be terrified by the prospect that things can still get worse.

Loyalty and the Press

Why Clinton Is Such An Ink-Stained Wretch

By DAVID E. ROSENBAUM

WASHINGTON
REMEMBER the "giant sucking sound" that Ross Perot kept talking about? The Philadelphia Inquirer editorialized last week: "It turned out to be Bill Clinton's money pump."

"The 1996 Clinton-Gore campaign," the editorial continued, "was pumping funds from everybody and anybody, legal or not, with a reckless abandon that will go down in the history books."

This, mind you, was not from some Republican organ. The Inquirer advocated President Clinton's reelection and normally supports Democratic candidates and Democratic policies. Now, like so many other such papers, the Inquirer has turned against him with a vengeance on the editorial page.

"In journalistic terms, Bill Clinton has no friend in court," said Stephen Hess, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution who specializes in the relationship between the Government and the press.

When Republican politicians get in trouble, the instinct of Republican editorial writers and columnists is usually to circle the wagons.

Editorial pages like those of The Wall Street Journal and The Washington Times have been critical of Speaker Newt Gingrich on some matters, but they defended him without reservation in his ethical tribulations early this year.

As the Gingrich controversy was being debated, The Weekly Standard, the political magazine launched in 1995 by Rupert Murdoch to air his conservative, Republican views, ran an editorial under the headline: "Stand By Your Man."

Conservative editorialists and columnists were also solidly on the side of President Reagan during the Iran-contra tumult a decade ago.

Even during Watergate, the conservative editorial pages of The Chicago Tribune and The Omaha World-Herald remained on the side of Richard M. Nixon until the damaging contents of the White House tapes were finally made public. The Wall Street Journal went even further, defending Mr. Nixon almost until the day he resigned.

Piling On

But no comparable Democratic press exists. When a Democratic politician runs into difficulty as Mr. Clinton has now, or as former Speaker Jim Wright did in 1989, the instinct of normally Democratic editorialists and columnists seems to be to pile on.

A White House official who follows press coverage could not identify any big-city paper or national magazine that has defended Mr. Clinton against charges of abusive campaign finance practices.

The New York Times, which also endorsed Mr. Clinton for reelection, has been among the most critical. After a Clinton news conference this month, The Times editorialized: "It was a fluid performance in Mr. Clinton's best slide-and-glide style. But most Americans do not believe in a universe where Johnny Chung hustles Presidential photo ops, Vice President Al Gore's telephoning is described as a model of political dignity and Maggie Williams's palming of a $50,000 check is praised as artful handling of a strained social situation."

Even The Nation, the most doggedly liberal of the national magazines, has criticized Mr. Clinton on the subject of campaign finance.

Mr. Clinton's standing is even worse than it might otherwise be because clean elections and campaign finance reform are staples of liberal doctrine.

Tom Rosenstiel, director of the Project for Excellence in Journalism, sponsored by the Pew Charitable Trust, described the situation this way: "There is more of a team mentality on the conservative side. There is, for instance, a great deal more intellectual collaboration between The Wall Street Journal editorial pages and Republican policy-makers than there is with any liberal editorial page and any Democratic policy-maker. There is no sense of loyalty to party among liberal commentators and editorial pages."

Commentators on both sides agree with that analysis. "We feel very loyal to principles; we do not feel any loyalty to a particular party or politician," said Jane R. Elmer, editorial page editor of The Philadelphia Inquirer.

Howell Raines, the editorial page editor of The Times, said that the healthiest development in journalism since World War II has been journalists' "shedding the mantle of partisanship and beginning to think of themselves as politically independent." Robert L. Bartley, editor of The Wall Street Journal, took a somewhat different tack. He said he did not think of the matter in terms of party but in terms of conservative versus liberal.

"You didn't see us jumping up and down in defense of Bob Packwood," he said. Senator Packwood, a moderate Republican who supported abortion rights and disavowed supply-side economics, was forced to resign in 1995 over charges of sexual misconduct. What if the same charges had been brought against Mr. Gingrich or Dick Armey, the House Republican leader, or some other staunch conservative? Mr. Bartley was asked.

"Yeah, we would have defended them," he replied. "That's the way it is."

"The drift of American journalism is liberal," Mr. Bartley said. "What we do a lot of is lean against the wind of the general news coverage. That's not a problem for liberal editorial pages. They don't have a wind to lean against."

William Kristol, editor of The Weekly Standard, had another distinction. "Democratic Party leaders," he said, "don't mean as much to liberals as Republican Party leaders have meant to conservatives."

He added: "Reagan and Gingrich weren't just party leaders. They were leaders of the conservative movement. Therefore, the assaults on Reagan and Gingrich were assaults on the conservative movement."

Conservative editorial writers, Mr. Kristol said, often think of themselves as "shaping the agenda for a movement." Their liberal counterparts, he said, have more "the tone of preaching eternal truths to an unenlightened citizenry."

Ham and Cheese on Oscar Night

By BERNARD WEINRAUB

REMEMBER the 1988 Academy Awards when the actor Rob Lowe, looking like a deer caught in the headlights, sang "Proud Mary" with a singer dressed as Snow White? (Disney sued.) Or 1972 when Satchel Littlefeather showed up instead of Marlon Brando to read a statement about American Indian rights after the actor won an Oscar for "The Godfather"? Or 1994 when David Letterman, the master of ceremonies, made so many awful jokes about people's names and physical attributes that Tom Hanks could be seen shaking his head in the audience?

Welcome to the 69th Academy Awards, the agonizingly long show (three hours plus) that most of us watch while mumbling about how awful it is. This year's version, which will be broadcast tomorrow night on ABC, promises to be a bit on the snooty side because of the raft of arty films nominated, including "The English Patient," "Shine" and "Secrets and Lies." But is there any doubt that many of the stars will wear inelegant and inappropriate outfits or make a dumb comment or two?

"The tackiness is why everyone loves it," said Damien Bona, co-author with Mason Wiley of "Inside Oscar" (Ballantine Books, 1986), a detailed and deadpan account of every Oscar ceremony since the first in 1927. "If it were sober and serious, it would be incredibly boring. Part of the fun of the show is really hoping for something you could roll your eyes at."

The billion viewers watching worldwide are entranced with the show, and Hollywood in general, because movie stars are like royalty, bigger than life, seemingly more beautiful, more glamorous, more wealthy than the rest of us. The Oscar ceremony offers a rare chance to see them up close and, in some ways, for what they are: vain, narcissistic and out of touch.

"We really want the show to confirm our worst fears about Hollywood," said Molly Haskell, the film critic. "We want the show to confirm that they're somehow tacky and vulgar and always saying 'me' 'me' 'me' and not being very serious about politics but doing things like wearing red ribbons. You remember the year when a guy streaked across the stage? Or when Vanessa Redgrave made her speech about the P.L.O.?"

Glamour vs. Tackiness

Terry Press, an executive at Dreamworks, the fledgling studio, said the reason so many watch the show is its unreality. "It's like watching a broadcast from Mars," she said. "It's entirely unreal. You're seeing clothes you can't afford and impossibly beautiful people. And everything you ever thought about Hollywood is verified in living color."

What has made the show even more tacky over the years are numbing, elaborate musical numbers often choreographed by Debbie Allen ("Don't they all look like 'Fame'?" said one studio executive, referring to Ms. Allen's most notable success). Even more embarrassing has been the scripted dialogue between the stars presenting the awards — dialogue meant to be casual but that often is just banal.

"This is, let's face it, celebrating ourselves, which is always a little embarrassing," said a top producer.

"There's simply no way for this to be anything but tacky."

Even the glamour is a bit cheesy. Many of the nominees and presenters are loaned their Calvin and Armanis; diamonds are provided, for the night.

The shows were probably more fun — and even sillier — in earlier years when they were held at the Ambassador Hotel or Biltmore Hotel in downtown Los Angeles. The ceremony, broadcast over the radio, included a banquet, and the actors and film makers occasionally got drunk (no, not quite like Frederic March in "A Star Is Born"). Nowadays the awards are given either at the Shrine Auditorium or the Dorothy Chandler Pavilion, and the stars wait until the parties afterward to get drunk.

Mr. Bona said he still misses the shows of the late 1960's and early 1970's, when down-market stars like Joey Heatherton and John Gavin showed up as presenters and when films like "The Alamo" and "Dr. Doolittle" were nominated.

Most Hollywood executives, agents and even stars who don't attend the ceremonies watch the televised show with the same blend of envy and humor as everyone else. Take Michael Black, a respected agent at International Creative Management, who watches the show with friends like Toni Howard, a top agent, and Sue Mengers, the legendary agent of the 1970's and 1980's.

"I love the show," Mr. Black said. "I love the glamour. Even since I was a kid in Long Island, I've watched every minute of it. It's the biggest night of my life. Of course, with my crowd, no one goes unscathed for what they're wearing or saying. If Mahatma Gandhi showed up to get an Oscar in his loincloth, he'd be eviscerated."

Job Seekers

Checking In At Hotel Hope

SAY what you will about welfare chiseling and sloth in the big city. New York last week presented striking tableaux of determination and striving — thousands of people of less-than-privileged circumstances willing to wait in line for hours for the slim chance to move one rung up the ladder, to a steady job with benefits. Some of those scenes are shown here. The magnet was the soon-to-reopen Roosevelt Hotel in Manhattan, which had advertised for applicants for 700 jobs as maids, cooks, waiters, desk clerks and the like.

In a routine repeated throughout the week, people began lining up before dawn last Tuesday, and by noon the line snaked for blocks through midtown. Elizabeth Gatling, a 55-year-old welfare recipient who waited eight hours to fill out an application; summed up the turnout concisely: "People in this city want to work." RACHEL L. SWARNS spies are active on every continent seeking to buy or steal technology to support the country's military and space programs. About half the 900 open investigations into illegal technology transfers on the West Coast involve China, whose spies have set up front companies from Hong Kong to Virginia Beach to facilitate an illegal harvest of Western technology.

"If we are talking about violations of U.S. law, the Chinese are surpassing the Russians," the F.B.I. chief of counterintelligence, Harry Godfrey 3d, told Congress a few years ago. "We have seen cases where they have encouraged people to apply to the C.I.A., the F.B.I., Naval Investigative Service and other Defense agencies," including the nuclear weapons laboratories at Los Alamos and Lawrence Livermore.

During much of the 1980's, as China was pursuing a course of modernization under the direction of Deng Xiaoping, Chinese scientists and engineers were welcomed in the United States. The C.I.A. even cooperated with China's intelligence czars to monitor Soviet missile tests in Central Asia.

Technology Theft

But after a while the F.B.I. and American intelligence officials began suspecting that Chinese visitors were trying to steal much of the technology they admired the most but could not acquire through legal channels. In one case, visiting American physicists noticed that China had built a linear accelerator for high-energy physics research that matched "down to the bolt patterns," as one put it, an accelerator at the Lawrence ness, the news media and the jet set of the British colony, which reverts to Chinese rule on July 1. Their mission is to identify every conceivable "threat" to a smooth transition, with threat being defined as democracy advocates, other critics of Beijing and Taiwan's agents of influence.

The intelligence service trains many of its spies at its own university, the Institute of International Relations in Beijing, which opened in 1965 and then closed the next year in the chaos of the Cultural Revolution. It re-opened again in 1978. Its graduates are some of the best and the brightest analysts in the Chinese Government, able to interpret a fast-changing world for Communist Party leaders who, for the most part, have traveled little outside their own country.

Sprinkled among the hundreds of correspondents sent to foreign capitals by the New China News Agency, China's state-run news service, are spies who file dispatches seen only by an exclusive audience of top officials.

The American tribute to China's espionage capability can be found deep within the United States Embassy in Beijing. Down a corridor in a windowless annex, there is a "quiet room," where ambassadors and visiting secretaries of state can retreat in the middle of the night to speak with each other or with officials in Washington.

The room is a suspended Plexiglas-like cube surrounded by fans whose motors create electromagnetic "noise" that bugging equipment cannot penetrate. That's what it takes when American diplomats live in an environment where the secretaries and drivers — even the cooks and maids — must be hired from Chinese personnel agencies controlled by, or reporting to, State Security.

In 1988, a young American communications officer in Beijing who got romantically involved with a Chinese woman was confronted by State Security officers who tried to blackmail him into becoming their spy. He escaped the trap and was bundled out of the country. A few years later, when a Voice of America correspondent confessed to an American Embassy official over tennis that he had a Chinese girlfriend who was a Communist Party member, the correspondent was immediately recalled.

Cover Jobs

Like every other institution in China, China's spy agencies are riddled with corruption and have suffered major defections to the West. In the eastern Chinese city of Wuxi, a large pyramid scheme that bilked millions of dollars from unsuspecting Chinese a few years ago was organized by the local Ministry for State Security organization. In Guangdong, American officials discovered that thugs hired by the spy service were trying to intimidate inspectors investigating one of China's largest factories producing pirated compact discs.

Like the American diplomatic corps, China's Ministry of Foreign Affairs provides "cover" for Chinese spies working as diplomats abroad. Cover is part of the game, which is why the Chinese were furious last week when James R. Lilley, a former United States Ambassador to Beijing and a longtime C.I.A. officer in Asia before that, suggested in a newspaper interview that Chinese spies posing as diplomats in the United States should be booted out "of the country to give them a lesson" about sticking their noses into American politics.

As if that's not part of the game, James.

Chief focuses of spying: Taiwan, trade and dissent.

Livermore Laboratory in California. There were other charges, never confirmed publicly by American officials, that China had acquired neutron bomb technology by exploiting its access to scientific research installations.

As a result, all Chinese scientists have been banned from visiting American nuclear weapons laboratories since the late 1980's.

The main tasks of China's intelligence service include penetrating all opposition groups based overseas, from the pro-democracy student groups in the United States to the exile headquarters of the Dalai Lama, Tibet's spiritual leader, in India. Another major target is Taiwan's intelligence operatives, who have long sought to disrupt the growing relationship between Washington and Beijing. In fact, in 1979, before Chinese spies had become very active on American soil, Treasury Secretary Michael Blumenthal received intelligence that Taiwanese agents had obtained $100,000 in cash, denominated in "old bills," to spread among members of Congress sympathetic to Taiwan's cause.

Western intelligence agencies estimate that the Ministry of State Security now has several thousand spies in Hong Kong, placed there over a decade to infiltrate government, busi-

The $1 Trillion Dogfight

Boeing and Airbus square off.

By ADAM BRYANT

YOU would think they were selling cans of cola to the chief executives of the world's airlines instead of flying machines that can cost more than $125 million apiece.

One Airbus marketing brochure depicts a Boeing 777 as an aging stretch-limousine painted taxicab yellow and the Airbus A340 as a sleek Mercedes sedan. In another, Airbus cattily points out the age of the Boeing 737, noting that the plane entered service the same year, 1968, that Richard M. Nixon was first elected President.

And in a brochure from Boeing, Airbus is not even granted the respect of being mentioned by name, with the company's wares referred to only as "Theirs."

Such flippancy selling materials show how serious the marketing battle has become between the Boeing Company and Airbus Industrie, the world's two superpowers in passenger planes.

In the last year, the skies were essentially cleared of second-tier competitors, as Fokker N.V. landed in bankruptcy and the McDonnell Douglas Corporation accepted a merger proposal from Boeing. That has left just two teams in the biggest contest in industry history.

"It will be like most Super Bowls," said Byron K. Callan, an aerospace analyst at Merrill Lynch. "It's going to be a very, very close game or it's going to be a blowout."

The stakes are huge: an estimated $1 trillion or more in orders over the next 20 years. Industry forecasts suggest that more than 13,500 planes will be built — eclipsing the size of the fleet now in service — to replace aging fleets and accommodate the growing demand for air travel, particularly in heavily populated developing countries like China. The "sticker price" of a Boeing passenger jet ranges from $32 million for its smallest plane, the 737, to $171 million for its newest offering, the 777; Airbus jets range from $40 million for the A319 to $128 million for the A340.

With just each other to worry about, Boeing and Airbus might be expected to act like most duopolies, settling back and cruising profitably on autopilot as they divvy up the skies.

But that will probably not happen anytime soon. For one thing, airline orders are typically measured in billions of dollars, so a lot rides on each sale. And those sales contracts are getting bigger. As competitive pressures mount for the airlines, the economies of scale gained from flying just one maker's planes are proving irresistible. In the last four months, American Airlines and Delta have signed long-term exclusive buying deals with Boeing, and US Airways has signed a large, although not exclusive, one with Airbus. If a customer is lost, it might be lost for a very long time.

"It's downright bloody out there," said John J. Leahy, an Airbus senior vice president and the company's chief salesman.

When pressed for their definition of victory in this trillion-dollar dog-fight, executives from Seattle-based Boeing, which has long dominated the industry, said they wanted to consistently win two-thirds of all new orders, about their current level. Airbus, a privately held consortium of manufacturers from Britain, France, Germany and Spain, wants to consistently win about half of all orders. That would represent a big jump for Airbus, which is less than half the size of Boeing. But considering how quickly this upstart has grown, its goal seems well within the realm of possibility.

Clearly, only one company will succeed in its goal, and at the expense of the other.

Comparing aircraft order statistics can be a dark science, but based on the companies' announcements of orders, compiled by Edmund S. Greenslet, an industry analyst, Boeing has won 63 percent of the plane orders over the last five years, Airbus has won 27 percent and McDonnell Douglas 10 percent. In the last year alone, however, Boeing won 66 percent of the orders, Airbus received 30 percent and McDonnell Douglas only 4 percent. (True to form, Airbus contends that the Boeing numbers are inflated because it counts less definitive orders, and that Airbus in fact won 44 percent of the orders last year.)

The battle is fraught with risks and uncertainties that could divide the market into larger or smaller slices than either company is projecting.

Airbus, for example, hopes to leapfrog over Boeing in jumbo-jet sales by building a double-decker plane that could hold more than 550 passengers. But if demand falls short of its projections, it may have trouble recouping its investment, which it estimates at $8 billion. Airbus could also stumble if its member companies start squabbling over the consortium's plan to raise money by going public. Boeing, meanwhile, may face difficulties of its own in digesting its planned acquisition of McDonnell Douglas, a deal that is considered unlikely to be blocked by antitrust regulators in Washington.

Because the stakes are so high, both sides appear to be fighting over every last order with everything they have.

Consider Airbus's failed effort to win over Delta. Among other things, Airbus bought $95,000 worth of television time in the airline's hometown of Atlanta for commercials about its planes. It was an unusual move, considering that Airbus really needed to sway just one person, Harry Alger, Delta's executive vice president for operations.

"At any corner, at any level of this company, they're there," Mr. Alger said of Airbus before he chose Boeing. Although he and other executives say they base their decisions on cost and technical capabilities of aircraft, such marketing efforts do not go unnoticed. "From a marketing standpoint, Airbus is very, very aggressive," he added.

Sometimes the manufacturers' marketing efforts get a helping hand from international politics.

Many airlines in the Far East, for example, have fleets that are largely from Boeing, a convenient and highly visible way for governments to put a dent in the United States trade deficit with Japan and the rest of the region. And when Saudi Arabia was in the market for new jets in 1993, President Clinton stepped in as part-time salesman and closed a $1-jet, $6 billion deal for Boeing and McDonnell Douglas to share.

Airbus has a clear edge in many European countries, where airlines like Lufthansa, Air France and Iberia tend to shop locally for new planes — no doubt with encouragement from officials of the four countries in which Airbus's partners reside.

For all that, the political realities can hinder as much as help the home team.

For example, Boeing has been building a relationship with China for 25 years, setting up training centers and developing an air-traffic control system there, and even making the country a subcontractor to build tail sections for its 737's. Boeing has also been an unpaid lobbyist in Washington, stumping for most-favored-nation status for China. Nonetheless, China thanked Boeing last year by placing a $1.5 billion order with Airbus, sending a signal to the Clinton Administration

Making it bigger doesn't make it better

Mr. and Mrs. Boeing better to move. (Overseeing flight, however, understand the difference.)

The Airbus Industrie A340 has been unveiled as the world's first four-engine, long-range jet.

The aircraft cabin is a subtle design of understated luxury. The cabin is the place where passengers are used to be automatically efficient through the jet.

Boeing's new standard of precision, technology and resources available, the A340 has already proven itself a regular commercial carrier with some of the world's most prestigious airlines.

True distinction: the world-class A340

As part of its effort to lure customers away from its much larger rival, Airbus has used a brochure that depicts a Boeing 777 as an aging, taxicab-yellow stretch limousine and the Airbus A340 as a sleek Mercedes sedan.

that it could turn to Europe if the United States became too pushy on human rights and trade issues.

Just last week, a possible order by China for a small fleet of 777's also became snarled by politics. In that case, China wants Vice President Al Gore to preside over the signing of the deal, a ticklish situation for Mr. Gore in light of China's role in the Administration's campaign finance imbroglio. A decision from Mr. Gore and a final word on the deal were pending as of Friday.

Boeing executives say that they are often treated as a political football.

"We are exposed to being used as something to kick," said Ronald B. Woodward, president of Boeing's commercial airplane group.

Airlines have done their share of kicking the manufacturers, too, but to win better deals — something they could do relatively easily when there were several manufacturers competing for sales. Continental Airlines found last year, for example, that it was able to get a better deal on 737's by telling Boeing it was considering buying MD-80's from McDonnell Douglas.

Over time, many industry experts say, Boeing and Airbus may be able to exert more control over pricing, particularly if they are able to sign up many airlines for long-term exclusive relationships. After all, an airline that flies an all-Boeing or all-Airbus fleet will have little desire to switch — mixing fleet types sharply increases training and other costs — and will therefore have less leverage in future negotiations for new aircraft.

The existence of just two major manufacturers may also smooth out the wide swings in this notoriously cyclical business. Historically, jet makers have ramped up employment and production to build planes when demand was high, only to have to lay off thousands of workers when it slackened. Now, with nowhere else for the airlines to go — barring the entry of a new manufacturer or the revival of Fokker — Boeing and Airbus should be able to manage those fluctuations better.

"The nature of the industry is changing," said Julius Maloutis, an airline analyst at Salomon Brothers. "Traditional aircraft gluts, which were the product of airline-buying frenzies, may be a thing of the past."

For now, though, the two companies are competing more aggressively than ever.

When Airbus wins an order, Boeing excuses its loss by saying that Airbus, as a consortium that has received government support, does not have the same operating constraints as a big publicly owned American company.

"There is no doubt that they will take risks that we, as a practical matter, cannot take," Mr. Woodward said. "We have different sets of business realities forced upon us."

Airbus executives retort that they are not undercutting Boeing, that they are repaying all the government loans they have received and that Boeing has received plenty of indirect government subsidies of its own.

Airbus has also criticized Boeing's penchant for exclusive contracts, saying that such a practice is bad for the airline industry because it eliminates new competitive bids for decades.

The two even jab each other over safety issues — long taboo among airlines and airplane manufacturers. Under the auspices of an information bulletin for employees in December, Mr. Woodward pointed out that throughout the jet age, safety has typically increased with each new generation of airplanes. "However, note that the Airbus A320/321 are an exception to this pattern," he wrote, referring to four crashes over the last nine years.

Airbus executives point out that investigators attributed all of those crashes to factors unrelated to the planes' airworthiness. "The A320 family is as safe or safer than anything made by our competitors," said Mr. Leahy, the Airbus senior vice president.

Airbus executives also say that Mr. Woodward's statement in the Boeing newsletter incorrectly suggested that the A321 model had a history of accidents. In fact, the model has never been in an accident. A spokesman for Airbus, David C. Venz, said that because Airbus aircraft use the most advanced data recorders, the cause of each accident of an Airbus plane has been quickly determined. "There have been no mysteries," Mr. Venz said in a thinly veiled reference to the uncertainty surrounding the cause of two Boeing 737 crashes, and the crash last summer of T.W.A. Flight 800, a Boeing 747.

And the spin goes on. Airbus likes to characterize its products as "money-making machines," compared with Boeing's "commodities." Airbus attributes Boeing's successes to the power of a "myth machine." In a presentation to reporters last year, Adam Brown, Airbus vice president for forecasting and strategic planning, talked about his frustration in sales campaigns with "a competitor who seems increasingly to treat the truth somewhat economically."

But Mr. Woodward of Boeing has registered similar complaints, even taking a shot at Mr. Brown personally. "I've watched him and his nose does grow longer when he talks," Mr. Woodward told reporters at the Farnborough Air Show in England in 1994.

But when the spinning stops, how do these companies really match up?

Each company, of course, has its strengths and its potential weaknesses.

Boeing's 747, which is much bigger than any Airbus model, gives Boeing a wider range of aircraft sizes. And with the combined resources, revenues and future profits from its acquisition of McDonnell Douglas, Boeing will have an enormous budget for research and development. (Last year, Boeing spent $1.2 billion in this area.) It also benefits from the transfer of technology between the commercial and military parts of its business. However, it is likely to have some difficulty integrating the McDonnell military operation and the Douglas aircraft business — which have never seen themselves as one company as it is — into Boeing.

Airbus has had many technological and marketing achievements. But it may trip as it tries to balance the varying interests of its members in creating a new, publicly held corporate structure.

Such a restructuring, though, also holds out the possibilities of greater efficiencies. Many functions, like market forecasting, are now done by each of its members, as well as by Airbus staff.

By all accounts, Airbus has taken a less conventional approach to designing and marketing aircraft, and that has paid off in its ability to oust McDonnell Douglas from the industry's No. 2 spot. Boeing made its mark by being the first to build jets, in the 1950's — a move that catapulted it past Douglas Aircraft.

Airbus is also counting on technological innovation to set it apart. For example, it adopted the concept of commonly equipped cockpits as its signature, enabling pilots to switch from one type of plane to another with minimal training. Because this represents a huge savings to airlines, Boeing has followed suit and now builds its 737 and 767 with common cockpits.

Airbus can also take credit for building the first wide-body jet, the A300, to fly with just two engines. It was the first to make a key piece of a production plane — the vertical tail fin — out of composite materials, and the first to use an entirely electronic flight system, rather than mechanical controls, to move key parts like the rudder.

The structure of Airbus, which was established as a risk-sharing partnership 27 years ago, is also unusual: Daimler-Benz of Germany and Aérospatiale of France each hold 37.9 percent, British Aerospace holds 20 percent and Construcciones Aeronauticas, or Cansa, of Spain owns 4.2 percent.

The companies in Airbus are also its key subcontractors. Generally, British Aerospace makes the wings, Daimler-Benz builds the fuselages and Cansa makes parts of the tail sections, while Aérospatiale produces the cockpits and assemblies most of the planes in Toulouse, France, where Airbus is based. A former Aérospatiale executive, Jean Pierson, is the chairman of Airbus.

Boeing takes a much more traditional approach to business. It wants to know an airline's needs better than the airline itself does, and then offer a numbingly thorough and tailored sales pitch.

"The Airbus crowd tends to be much more image-driven," said Robert W. Baker, executive vice president for operations at American, who last November committed the airline to buying Boeing jets for the next 20 years, and placed an initial order for 103 jets worth $8.6 billion. "Boeing is a very methodical corporation, and has perhaps done a little better job of reading customers' desires."

For example, Robert L. Crandall, American's chairman, has long complained that when a reading light burns out on his company's aircraft, a mechanic is needed to replace it. Boeing took care of that problem on its new 777, in which the lights can be changed by flight attendants.

Airbus executives say they also listen closely to customers, and again blame what they call the Boeing myth machine — in this case, for the common perception that Boeing was the first to grow ears.

Sheila Heslin's Warning

If someone had listened to Sheila Heslin, the Clinton Administration might not be in so much legal trouble. For that matter, Anthony Lake might be Director of Central Intelligence. Ms. Heslin was the National Security Council aide who fought so hard to keep a particularly unseemly bit of campaign fund-raising from besmirching the White House. That in the end she failed is perhaps the most convincing evidence to date that the Clinton campaign's frantic hunt for money overwhelmed all sense of ethics and protocol in the White House.

The outline of Ms. Heslin's effort, first reported by The Wall Street Journal, is by now well known. For months in 1995 she rebuffed requests for assistance from Roger Tamraz, an international oilman eager to get American support for an ambitious pipeline deal in Central Asia. Mr. Tamraz, who has had dealings with Iraq and Libya and faces embezzlement charges in Lebanon, also wanted to meet with President Clinton. Ms. Heslin was understandably dubious. Her doubts were reinforced by a C.I.A. report on Mr. Tamraz's overseas activities.

But Mr. Tamraz was not to be denied. He spent lavishly in 1995 and 1996 to ingratiate himself with the Democrats, giving $177,000 to national and state party organizations. As those donations were accumulating in late 1995, Ms. Heslin says she got an unexpected call from Donald Fowler, the chairman of the Democratic National Committee. He urged her to help Mr. Tamraz and reportedly told her the C.I.A. would be in touch.

Soon a sanitized version of the C.I.A. report was sent to Ms. Heslin. Troubled by the political interference, she reported the case to a supervisor who told Mr. Fowler his efforts were inappropriate. Despite Ms. Heslin's concerns, Mr. Tamraz was invited to a White House Christmas reception in December 1995 and four other White House functions last year. The C.I.A. is now investigating how it was drawn into this campaign scheming, which was a brazen misuse of the agency for political purposes.

With Mr. Fowler now claiming amnesia about much of the affair, it is hard to determine precisely how the party reached into the C.I.A. for assistance. But it is abundantly clear from this case that the Clinton fund-raisers had permission to override the usual safeguards against manipulation of the Government to raise political money.

Mr. Lake was Ms. Heslin's boss when she was trying to keep Mr. Tamraz away from Mr. Clinton and, in turn, from the management of American foreign policy. Had Mr. Lake's office been better organized, he might have learned of Ms. Heslin's efforts and warned Mr. Clinton about the oilman's record. But it seems increasingly clear that Mr. Lake was operating in a White House where policy makers had less clout than fund-raisers who had picked international businesses and foreign entrepreneurs as principal targets.

It was no accident that campaign donors were included on trade missions, allowed to bring questionable foreign visitors to meetings with Mr. Clinton or even abetted in dodging the objections of the National Security Council staff. All these things happened because Mr. Clinton allowed a systemic disrespect for the normal barriers that might have prevented such abuses.

It is fine for Mr. Clinton now to talk about the importance of staying in touch with supporters and not rejecting their counsel simply because they helped finance his campaign. But back when election fever gripped the White House, the less noble reality was that Sheila Heslin was powerless to stop a campaign that was out of control.

Religious Freedom, Constitutionally

A small church in the town of Boerne, Tex., provides the backdrop for one of this term's most significant Supreme Court cases. The church, faced with overcrowding, sought a permit to demolish most of its 74-year-old Mission Revival structure and expand into Boerne's historic district. When the permit was denied, the church sued the town, alleging a violation of its religious freedom under a Federal statute called the Religious Freedom Restoration Act. The city responded by challenging the act's constitutionality, raising the core issue that the Court must now decide.

An impressive array of religious and civil rights groups are urging that the law be upheld. They are rightly concerned about the implications for religious freedom if it is overturned. But the immediate issue is not religious liberty. It is whether the law's attempt to counter a damaging Supreme Court decision violates the constitutional separation of powers. This launches the dispute into a gray area that makes the outcome hard to predict. If the Court strikes down the statute, the justices need to reconsider the flawed ruling that inspired it.

The religious freedom law, approved by an unusually united Congress and enthusiastically signed by President Clinton in 1993, was a response to a Supreme Court decision in 1990 that watered down the First Amendment's protection of "the free exercise" of religion. That decision held that churches have no special exemption from "neutral, generally applicable" laws that happen, as a by-product, to burden religious exercise. In that case, the Court approved using a state's general ban on peyote to prohibit the drug's use in religious rituals by a Native American church. Other rulings impinging on the free exercise of religion followed.

The Religious Freedom Restoration Act sought to blunt the original decision by setting a very high standard for governments to meet if they are to override claims of religious liberty. Under the act, governments may not enforce laws that "substantially burden" the exercise of religion without demonstrating a "compelling" need to do so, and without using "the least restrictive means."

It is clear that, in the absence of a constitutional amendment, Congress cannot directly overturn a Supreme Court decision. But last January a Federal appeals panel hearing the Texas case upheld the act as a legitimate exercise of Congress's independent authority under the 14th Amendment to enforce constitutional rights by granting broader protection than the Supreme Court. The exact boundary of that authority is an unsettled issue. When the case was argued recently, several justices seemed concerned that the act trespassed on the Court's role as sole interpreter of the Constitution.

Fortunately, if the Court wants to strike down the statute, there are principled ways to do so without jeopardizing past holdings on civil rights or abandoning religious liberty. If the Court rejects the act, it can recognize the underlying concern, broadly shared, that the Court's current approach inadequately protects religious observance from government interference. A wise Court would heed the message, and find a better balance.

Pillage as Protest

When calm returns, Albanians will have to rebuild their country not just politically, but physically. They did not just protest after the collapse of the pyramid schemes that took the vast majority of the country's savings. They razed and looted. They set fire to the library at the main agricultural university, burning 150,000 books. They torched buildings considered historical treasures. They destroyed not only the symbols of a hated Government, but also their own achievements and patrimony.

The explanation lies in Albania's Communist past. For 45 years, totalitarianism and isolation were so complete that many Albanians were not aware that others lived differently. Except for officials, no one came to the country and no Albanians traveled abroad. Albanians did not know that elsewhere people owned cars, forbidden in Albania. They were unaware that abroad a family was not condemned to a prison village for generations because one member criticized the regime. In other Communist countries, people dreamed of freedom. In Albania, many did not know what freedom was.

Totalitarianism continues to imprison Albanians even though it is now just an afterimage, a trick of their own minds. Albania's last great howl, in 1991, also took the form not of protest, but of pillage. When Communism fell, the police state dissolved and Albania plunged into chaos. The farming village of Plug was typical. One night about half of Plug's population of 450 stormed the village storehouse, emerging with fistfuls of spoons, sacks of flour, armfuls of underwear and soap. They stripped the day care center of mattresses. They destroyed the generators and farm machines. When I visited Plug three years later, the health clinic's obstetrical gurney was serving as one family's laundry and garden cart. Villagers could no longer irrigate their farmland, which became an overgrown meadow.

All over the country, the electrical system and national railway collapsed as people stole wires and switches. Albanians had been told for decades that these items belonged to the people. It was about time the people could take them home.

The looting was an explosion, Albanians' first after decades of humiliation. It was also a sign that they lacked an idea indispensable for civil society, the common good. The Communists pushed the common good endlessly. Work for Mother Albania! Plug responded by taking the village stethoscope home for the kids to play with.

People in Plug told me they looted because they feared that the coming regime would take everything for its own followers. They could not picture a world where flour was not measured out on the basis of politics.

They were not far wrong. I first met Sali Berisha around the time of the 1991 looting. Mr. Berisha had been a Communist in the old regime, not a dissident, as Albania did not grow dissidents. But he now led the opposition, and he talked like a democrat. As President, however, he jelled his adversaries, packed the courts, rigged elections and turned the country's only television news into TV Berisha. To many Albanians, this was normal behavior. They were more angry about corruption, especially the idea that payoffs might have bought Government tolerance of the recent pyramid schemes.

Albania's grotesque Communism discredited the civic trust that is vital for democracy and capitalism. Without it, bureaucrats take bribes, politicians cling to power for fear of losing everything if they leave, businessmen forgo the long-term investment for the quick scam. To the dismay of Albanians, this is their country today. People watch Italian television. They know what kind of society they want. But how do they get there? Still prisoners of their past, Albanians have so far found few ways other than by boat.

U.S. Mustn't Meddle in Russia's Politics

To the Editor:

In "Helsinki Hopes" (column, March 16), William Safire gets some facts wrong. For example, it is incorrect to say that President Boris N. Yeltsin of Russia is "$10 billion short in payments of wages to teachers, police and the military"; only 20 percent of this sum is owed by the Government, the rest by privatized factories.

But more to the point, Mr. Safire makes the remarkable, even fanciful recommendation that President Clinton should impose political conditionality on President Yeltsin by making it plain that "America would respond positively to a Yeltsin coalition with Yabloko's democratic reformers," led by Grigory Yavlinsky.

This suggestion must be roundly rejected. Economic conditionality is hard enough to impose. But the idea that Mr. Clinton can get Mr. Yeltsin and Anatoly Chubais, the First Deputy Prime Minister, to accept a political coalition, especially with Mr. Yavlinsky under the latter's "condition," as Mr. Safire desires, is hard to take seriously.

This is all the more so when Mr. Chubais has just consolidated his position within the Government, with the appointment of key loyalists like the reformist governor Boris Nemtsov, the privatizer Alfred Kokh and the economics expert Yakov Yurinson to the new Russian Cabinet, weakening any bargaining position that Mr. Yavlinsky may have hoped for earlier. Indeed, Mr. Yavlinsky may well find himself in the role of a "permanent oppositionist," a title bestowed on him by Gen. Aleksandr Lebed.

But then Mr. Chubais's own commitment to reforms need not be doubted. Nor his strategic sense, which was in full display in insuring Mr. Yeltsin's re-election and is to be inferred from Mr. Yeltsin's appointment of him as the economics czar leading the next stages of reforms. Mr. Safire's misgivings, prompted by his admiration for Mr. Yavlinsky, are misplaced.

Saving Farms May Not Benefit Farming

To the Editor:

Re your March 20 news article on farmland preservation efforts: My own research on preservation in New England suggests that farming and farmers may not be the beneficiaries.

The local coalitions of homeowners and conservationists that typically push for farmland protection are interested in providing a range of amenities: open space, scenic views, growth control, maintenance of community character and ecological integrity. The result is higher land prices and property values, especially for sites adjoining scenic open farmland, which perversely increases the demand for upscale development in the countryside.

We are witnessing a transition from a time when improved farmland was considered a mark of human industry to a time when exurban dwellers look out at fields and pastures and see wild nature itself. This cultural shift toward the passive consumption of nature does not bode well for protecting prime farmland for agricultural production.

We may, instead, be creating a pastoral landscape from which farming has been excluded, a virtual garden tended only by weekend gardeners.

France Is Concerned For Zairian Refugees

To the Editor:

David Aronson's March 18 Op-Ed article, "Zaire's French Connection," contains inaccurate assertions that I would like to address.

France has called for the establishment of a multinational operation in eastern Zaire for one reason: Hundreds of thousands of refugees are being prevented from receiving aid from humanitarian organizations because of fighting. France declared that it was ready to fulfill its humanitarian duty in response to an appeal by Kofi Annan, the United Nations Secretary General — an appeal that has gone unheeded. It continues to call for the implementation of the United Nations peace plan unanimously approved by the Security Council.

What France supports is Zaire's territorial integrity and stability. It is seeking a peaceful political resolution to the crisis, notably through the organization of internationally monitored elections. France also supports the democratization process that has been under way in Africa for the past several years. Democracy, good government and development were the principal themes of the last French-African summit, held in Burkina Faso last December, in which 45 African countries participated.

Mr. Aronson claims that France has supported Zaire's Government because it "favored French businesses." But take a look at who Zaire's main trading partners really are. France is not among them.

I was particularly surprised by the implicit requirement that, in order to be effective, soldiers belonging to a multinational force must be able to distinguish between Hutus and Tutsis. We have seen the kinds of extreme actions such distinctions lead to.

Yes, Digital Television Is a Long Way Off

To the Editor:

Your March 17 editorial "Speeding Up Digital TV" is perfectly right in saying it will take far longer than eight years for digital advanced television to replace analogue; 30 years is closer to it. But the reason is not the reluctance of the evil, monopolistic broadcasters, but simply the old chicken-and-egg problem we faced 50 years ago when FM radio was supposed to replace AM.

Broadcasting is not customer entertainment, it is business advertising. Businesses will not sponsor programs for which there are no listeners or viewers, and viewers will certainly not buy a $1,000 television set when there are no programs to watch.

Further, to expect the public to abandon in eight years perhaps a quarter of a billion televisions, VCR's and camcorders just to enjoy certain engineering niceties is naive.

As Rents Go Up

To the Editor:

In your article "As Rents Move Up, Roommates Move In" (Home section, March 20), you provide a chart about what a renter may earn and what he or she can afford. However, there needs to be some fine print. The reality is that most desirable Manhattan apartments are procured only through brokers, who charge up to 15 percent of the first year's rent. So that one-bedroom for $2,097 in lower Manhattan has a fee of $3,774.60, thereby raising the first year's rent to $2,411.55 per month.

If memory serves, the fees when I moved to New York nine years ago were either one month's rent or 10 percent of the first year's rent. It seems that rents aren't the only things spinning out of control in this city.

Science Talent Search

To the Editor:

Although it may be the case, as you argue (editorial, March 18), that excellence in the Westinghouse Science Talent Search "is clearly determined less by the field of study than by the depth of the questions posed by the entrants and the originality of their methods and answers," many of the traditional fields of study are excluded from consideration because of the anxiety of Westinghouse officials about animal rights protests.

As a consequence, students who look to the Westinghouse competition for recognition cannot carry out the most innocuous and noninvasive study on even a fish or frog — a sad anachronism in these times of heightened interest in the behavioral sciences, neuroscience and medicine.

A Bagel Feast for Hawaii G.I.'s, Thanks to Temple Shalom-Aloha

To the Editor:

Re "Is a Bagel Still a Bagel in Maui?" about the expansion of regional cuisines in America (Week in Review, March 16): In the mid-1950's I was stationed with the 25th Infantry Division at Schofield Barracks in Hawaii. I attended services at a temple named Shalom-Aloha.

On one holiday the Jewish community in Honolulu gave the recipe for bagels to a local Japanese baker, and the bagels he made were distributed to military personnel attending services. I wound up with the surplus bagels and took them back to my barracks. The next morning I brought the bagels to the mess hall and instructed the cooks to slice them in half, spread butter on them and toast them on the grill. They were a huge success.

On another occasion, I wound up with several large boxes of matzo. I put one matzo on everyone's bunk. The next morning after showering and dressing, I noticed they were all gone. Another gastronomic success?

To the Editor:

In "Is a Bagel Still a Bagel in Maui?" (Week in Review, March 16), you place me on the wrong side of the regional foods fence.

Regional foods can be produced with quality and authenticity, if that is the food maker's choice. My brief quote, "Most domestic brie is inedible," was plucked from a broader opinion in which I said that this realm of cheese production existed by design rather than destiny. My examples of superior French regional milks related to the skills of the artisan cheesemakers, who can and do exist in this country.

Mediocrity can rear its head anywhere. I've eaten overcooked lobster in Maine and bland mozzarella in Little Italy. Quality is an achievement, not a naturally occurring phenomenon.

Redesigning Society

To the Editor:

Frank Rich's March 20 column "20th Century Unlimited" laments the absence of greater public knowledge of the industrial designer Henry Dreyfuss. Jeffrey Meikle's book "Twentieth Century Limited" (1979) discusses Dreyfuss and other pioneers in that field.

But one must be careful not to equate Dreyfuss's products for the masses with grass-roots democracy. He and his peers saw themselves as redesigning American society. And they naively believed that their favored streamlining style would be permanent. One should celebrate Dreyfuss's achievements, but with a bit of restraint.

Star of the Month Club

Without a single envelope being opened, Oscar's verdict is already in. Major-studio movies were so bad in 1996 — "the worst year in Hollywood history," says the two-time Oscar-winning screenwriter William Goldman in Los Angeles magazine — that the Academy could bring itself to nominate only one such movie ("Jerry Maguire") for Best Picture. The other competitors, from "Fargo" to "Shine," are from smaller, independent companies and some are major-studio rejects. Fox would have made "The English Patient," for instance, if only Kristin Scott Thomas had been jettisoned for Demi Moore.

Hollywood's decline into a blockbuster mentality — in which every movie has to cost $100 million and be built around a "high" (i.e., low) concept, special effects and a star — may have reached its apotheosis last year, but it's old news. What's more unsettling is how Hollywood's gigantism permeates the rest of the culture: Much as the studios would rather make "Waterworld" than "Lone Star," so blockbuster museum shows squeeze out thoughtful smaller art exhibitions, musical spectacles push drama off Broadway, and oversold events like "The Three Tenors" drive chancier repertoire out of the classical recording industry. But the newest frontier for Hollywoodization may be the saddest yet — book publishing.

Hollywood's tighter hold on books was inevitable. In the new cultural world created by synergistic media mergers, book publishers and movie studios and, increasingly, those "independent" filmmakers all share the same few corporate parents. As Tom Engelhardt wrote in The Nation, publishing houses are now "divisions" and "imprints" lodged in entertainment conglomerates. Little, Brown is a corporate cousin of Warner Brothers as Harper Collins is of Fox and Simon & Schuster is of Paramount. Michael Oviatt, the former agent and deposed Disney president, is chairing this year's benefit for the literary human-rights organization, PEN.

Publishing has never been shock or showbiz-free. Long before Jackie Collins, there was Jackie Susann; if a sitcom star like Tim Allen can be an "author," now, so, decades ago, was Art Linkletter. But even the most optimistic publishing hands see a rise in their industry's Hollywoodization. Good books that are not written by Dick Morris, Mark Fuhrman or John Grisham had better catch on fast or they'll be yanked from distribution as quickly as well-reviewed movies that open slowly.

Some of those good books, more and more of which have to fight their way into print in the first place, may be doomed before they're even shipped because they get only the leftovers of a big house's promotional budget. With the decline of independent bookstores and the rise of superstores like Barnes & Noble that charge for prominent display space, word-of-mouth alone can't put a new novel on the map. "Not even God can make a best seller out of a book that doesn't have a marketing budget," says Anne Larsen of Kirkus Reviews. (Oprah can — but only one book per month.)

Perhaps the weirdest fallout of Hollywoodization on publishing, though, is the growing emphasis on writers with movie-star looks. Jonathan than Galassi of Farrar, Straus, points out that a promotional tour can now ride on "how mediagenic the author is." The catalogue for Rob Weisbach Books, a new William Morrow imprint run by the editor who crafted best sellers by Jerry Seinfeld and Paul Reiser, goes so far as to display all its writers like Calvin Klein models.

Literary journalists can get sucked into the hype as well. Though Kathryn Harrison's tell-all memoir about incest, "The Kiss," received dismissive reviews and is on no major best-seller list, it is now spawning a cottage industry of grandiose attacks in magazines like The New Republic and The Weekly Standard — thus giving a book that might have sunk just the vociferous second wave of notoriety its publisher, Random House, can exploit.

"We all know that if Kathryn Harrison" — who is highly photogenic — "were a dumpy-looking lady with Coke-bottle glasses, none of this would have happened," observed an editor at another house, who then wondered which of the "strange-looking authors throughout history" might be literary stars now. These days, even "Moby Dick" might not be enough to get Melville booked on "Good Morning America." □

Hollywood Falls for 'Art'

By John Gregory Dunne

Tomorrow night, before an international television audience, the Academy Awards will be announced, and early on Tuesday morning the post-mortems will begin. The show will be described, as it is every year, as "tacky." The academy membership will be called, as it is every year, "moribund." Critics and cineastes will lament, as they do every year, what is happening "out there," on what the rhetorically challenged persist in calling "the Left Coast."

In fact, the post-mortems will be, as they are every year, wrong. Hollywood remains a kind of willed terra incognita to anyone who does not actually work there.

"People in the East pretend to be interested in how pictures are made," F. Scott Fitzgerald wrote in his notes for "The Last Tycoon," but "they never see the ventriloquist for the doll. Even the intellectuals, who should know better, like to hear about the pretensions, the extravagances and vulgarities — tell them pictures have a private grammar, like politics or automobile production or society, and watch the blank look come into their faces."

Those who work in the movie community understand that Hollywood is a company town, a closed-shop union town. The Academy of Motion Picture Arts and Sciences has 5,227 voting members (I belong to the writers' branch). The vast majority of this membership belongs to a union or a guild. In addition to actors, directors, producers and writers, there are also academy members in the craft categories — makeup, sound, sound-effects editing, special effects, visual effects, film editing, cinematography, even public relations — and they all vote.

Consider what might happen if the New York Film Critics Circle, most of whose 30 or so members work for unionized publications or television stations, opened its membership and gave the vote to an additional 6,000 camera operators, pressmen, secretaries from the Newspaper Guild, a salesman, copy editors, editorial writers, sports columnists and assistant publishers. I suspect their choices would be no less moribund than those of the academy.

Historically, the Oscars were the awards of any union in a company town, a vote for jobs. Hits create jobs, flops do not. It was democracy in action. If the best pictures were often not rewarded, it should also be noted that in another model of democracy in action, we do not often get a chance to vote for the best qualified candidates for President of the United States.

In this vein, the best screenplay nomination to Kenneth Branagh for his uncut "Hamlet" seems less preposterous to me than to the scoffers in the civilian world. It represents a marvelously subtle act of protest on the part of the writers' branch that tacitly honors Mr. Branagh for not taking Shakespeare through dozens of rewrites, as happens with every other screenwriter.

The spin on tomorrow's Oscar ceremony

John Gregory Dunne is the author, most recently, of "Monster: Living Off the Big Screen."

emony is that 1997 is the year of the independent production — scrappy, tough-minded little pictures, with no bloated and costly special effects or computer-generated backdrops. "Jerry Maguire" is the only big-budget studio entry, and it, essentially, is just a funny little love story with many four-letter words that don't matter and one six-letter word that does — Cruise.

Many reasons are advanced for the attention the academy paid to "Breaking the Waves," "The English Patient," "Fargo," "Secrets and Lies," "Sling Blade" and "Shine." The most prevalent theory is that academy membership is getting younger and hipper. Even the editorial page of this newspaper wondered if the academy had "been taken over by a new crowd of young sophisticates."

In the past, criticism of the academy's choices was generally directed at what critics felt impelled to call the "geezer" vote, those members, usually over 60, who were thought to stand athwart anything that was new, edgy or original.

Alas, I am a geezer, one who, although eligible since 1971, never was interested enough to join the academy until 1994. (The best demonstration of this lack of interest is that I have never seen "E.T." or "Jurassic Park.")

As a geezer, I am qualified to offer a more mundane explanation for the eclectic choices on this year's ballot. The reason is video. Over the past few years, studios and independents have altered their marketing strategies in an effort to garner the maximum number of nominations for their product. From Thanksgiving on, academy members are assaulted with specially produced videos of any film that might possibly stand a chance, however slim, of a nomination in whatever category. These videos are why I finally joined the academy.

This season, the Fox box contained eight videos, the Disney box four (including "Up Close and Personal," a picture my wife and I wrote), the Universal and Paramount boxes five each; late entries ("Ransom," "Evita," "The Preacher's Wife") arrived separately. The independents, especially Miramax, were equally profligate, if not more so. In all, I received 73 videos. (Actually since my wife is also in the academy, we received 146; this made our apartment the favorite video outlet for our friends.)

Except for critics, most people, even those in the business, do not see 73 movies in a year. The videos allow members to take a look at pictures they might otherwise have missed in the theaters, and the eventual nominations paralleled this wider, more esoteric selection.

I should confess, however, that I was less struck by the "more provocative, character-driven dramas" financed by the independents than either the critics or the academy membership at large. Some were quite frankly derivative. "Sling Blade" seemed no more than "Rainman Visits Arkansas." "Shine," this year's feel-good movie, was out of the "Rocky" school, "Rocky Tackles the Ivories."

Essay

WILLIAM SAFIRE

Headless House

WASHINGTON
When the editorial pages of both The Washington Post and New York Times praise the House Republican leadership for being marvelously responsible about budgets and taxes — watch out.

It means G.O.P. lawmakers, transmuted by one demagogic Clinton slogan and concerned only with protecting their seats, are selling conservative budget principles down the Potomac River.

Let's forget, those principles include: shrinking intrusive government. Curbing the explosion of entitlements. Letting workers and investors keep more of their earnings. Ending the Federal borrowing binge that will burden our children.

The paralyzing slogan that has turned our churlish champions of change into stammering stooges of status is this: "Don't let those Republicans slash your Medicare to pay for tax cuts for the rich."

Speaker Newt Gingrich's "strategy" is to sever the connection Clinton's Dick Morris made between reducing taxes and throwing Grandma out in the cold.

Here's how Newt expected to fool the demagogues. First produce a budget resolution for now until 2002 with enough spending slowdowns and rosy projections to show a surplus. Then sucker the minority leader, Dick Gephardt, into a grand reconciliation. Then pass tax cuts separately to sop up the surplus, leaving a budget in balance and Democrats stupefied.

This Machiavellian maneuver was intended to give cover to House Republicans nibbling their nails about supporting a long-overdue 1 percent correction of the inflated Consumer Price Index. If they bit that most necessary bullet, saving about $150 billion in excessive payments every year, Democrats would grab the gezzar vote with "Don't let those Republicans cut your Social Security to pay for tax cuts for the rich" (shudder).

That's why Gingrich's dwindling supporters whisper "watch the B.L.S. for a surprise." They think they have a deal with Clinton for the Bureau of Labor Statistics — with no pushing from a bipartisan commission — to surprise us all with a two-tenths of 1 percent revision of the C.P.I. That would save $16 billion each year, starting — well, when they get around to it.

The purpose of all this blue smoke and mirrors is to enable the Speaker to lie low; to let people forget his book deal; to curry favor with liberal editors and talking heads, and to hope he can get away with letting contributors pay his $300,000 ethics fine. In that way, by year's end, if his colleagues no longer expect him to be the Democrats' poster boy in 1998, he might not have to step down.

What kind of way is that for a Republican majority to run the House? Was the G.O.P. returned to power for the first time in living memory to enable its Speaker to lick his wounds and look at his polls?

Here we are with a President reaping the whirlwind of his campaign's corruption, with the D.N.C. in disgrace, with heavy hearings and indictments imminent, with the moment for a balanced budget containing real tax cuts crying out to be seized — and dithering G.O.P. solons are loyally murmuring "He ain't heavy, he's our Speaker."

To look busy while awaiting national amnesia, Mr. Gingrich will soon junket to Communist China (bypassing capitalist Taiwan). At least John Kasich, the Budget chairman, has an excuse for leaving the ramparts — he's in love, getting married this weekend — but after that honeymoon, the honeymoon will be over.

The vacuum of leadership was dramatized last week when 11 sophomores — the heart of the revolutionary class of '94 — stuck their collective thumb in Gingrich's eye by voting down a big budget for Dan Burton's oversight committee.

Optimistic reason for the sophomores' revolt was to remind the G.O.P. caucus that they ran against inflated staffs and committee budgets, but their intent was to wake up the crew at the helm. When the yet-again-chastened Gingrich declared himself "deeply committed" to tax cuts, oversight was reasonably funded.

Congress is wonderfully messy and no majority should march in lock step, but conservative voters expect leaders to show some consistency in principle. Stop playing not to lose, Republican representatives; forget editorial praise and do what you were elected to do. The only thing you have to fear is a fearsome slogan. □

After 25 Years, 'Godfather' is a Family Saga For the Ages

The intimacy of the family members makes their violence more terrifying.

By EDWARD ROTHSTEIN

THERE are some members of the Corleone crime family whose offers we couldn't refuse. Who could deny Clemenza a favor after watching him make spaghetti sauce? Or turn down a request from Tom Hagen after seeing the empathy on his face as an old family friend is led away for his last limo ride?

While watching Frances Ford Coppola's "The Godfather," we even feel sympathy for the thuggish Luca Brasi as an ice pick goes through his hand. And there is something charming in the way Clemenza keeps an errand for his wife in mind as he completes a particularly bloody job. "Leave the gun," he calls to his colleague. "Take the cannoli."

But as the 25-year-old film based on the Mario Puzo novel returns to theaters with a digitally remastered soundtrack and freshly minted prints, its juxtaposition of heartfelt loyalty and horrific vengeance, its mix of ethnic charms and coldblooded calculations can also cause chills. We may have learned the first time around what it means to sleep with the fishes and what lies under the Hollywood mogul's silk sheets, but we watch with ambivalent compulsion, covering the eyes while peering through the fingers.

The film's mixture of family values and Family values, its combination of blood relations and relations based on blood, sent a shock through the somnolent movie business when it was first released in 1972. Despite Paramount's early support for Mr. Puzo, the studio got cold feet when it came time to make the movie. Then, Costa-Gavras, Peter Yates and Otto Preminger refused to direct.

And when Mr. Coppola finally agreed (without a single money-making hit to his credit), he cast his old friends James Caan and Robert Duval, a young unknown named Al Pacino and a volatile eccentric (Marlon Brando) as he worked on the screenplay, long-distance, with Mr. Puzo. As Harlan Lebo points out in his new book, "The Godfather Legacy," which traces the making of the movie, Mr. Coppola and Mr. Pacino kept expecting to be dismissed as the filming went on.

Then, of course, it became the highest-grossing film of its time. The film seemed an extension of the era's headlines. As it was being made, one prominent mob leader, Joe Colombo, was shot; as it was shown, another, Joseph Gallo, was gunned down. Then life started imitating art in earnest: according to F.B.I. informants, members of the mob began to mimic the hand-kissing and dialogue of the fictional Corleones.

The Godfather even spawned its own filmic family. Mr. Coppola created a "Godfather Part II" in 1974 and a "Godfather Part III" in 1990. He repackaged the first two films into a "Saga" for television, an expanded "Epic" for home video, and, finally, a chronologically remodeled "Trilogy" for laser disk and video release, each with its own insertions and deletions from original footage. The Italian mobster genre, in which wine and blood tend to flow freely, flourished with films like "Prizzi's Honor," "Goodfellas," "Casino" and most recently, "Donnie Brasco," in which Mr. Pacino inverts the status of his "Godfather" role, playing a mob loser.

The Italian-American Civil Rights League, founded by Joe Colombo, originally worried that "The Godfather" would engage in ethnic slurs. But as it turned out, at the heart of the movie is a forthright assertion of ethnic identity as a source of strength. That is where we find the human side of the mob, its warmth and loyalty, its love of cannolis. Aside from the nature of the family business, the plot could be about an immigrant family trying to preserve its ethnic traditions. The Corleone family values are stalwart, asserting that security is not to be found in the chaos of the New World but in the Sicilian customs of the Old. Blood is a tighter bond than any other, the family a haven in a heartless world.

The classic American gangster movie actually grew out of similar ethnic universes. The gangster, as in "Little Caesar" or "The Public Enemy," is typically a second-generation American—at that time, Irish or Italian—who breaks away from Old World family ties. But instead of Americanization he chooses criminalization, creating his own world of allegiances. The traditional movie would then show the error of his ways, the disastrous consequences of rejecting the social compact.

"The Godfather" rejects that pattern. The Don's youngest and brightest son, Michael, returns from World War II in an Army uniform, full of hopes, determined to avoid the family business and its Sicilian origins. With his WASP fiancée, he watches supplicants enter his father's office, vowing to have no part of it. He will rebel into respectability and Americanization.

But the Old World asserts its claims. The Don once objected to Michael's going off to war to risk his life for strangers; only the Family (or family) could merit such sacrifice. Michael finally seems to feel the same way. So do other Family members. "I believe in America" are the first words of the movie, spoken by the heavily-accented Italian undertaker to the Don. "I went to the police like a good American." Still, like Michael, he learns that blood is thicker than citizenship. In this gangster film, the rebel returns home and Americanization is a failure.

This cynical take on the American dream is closely connected to the period in which the film was made. While "The Godfather" was being filmed, the Vietnam War was going on, protests raged, and countercultural ideas were in full force. America was portrayed as unjust, morally bankrupt. Mr. Coppola's twist was in turning an immigrant family into America's nemesis: the Corleones often take on a heroic cast.

The movie's sequels go even further. Family life may not be all Michael expected, yet the surrounding world is even worse. In "The Godfather, Part II," senators and businessmen are just varieties of American mobsters. In "The Godfather, Part III" even the Vatican is rotten with graft and murder.

Mr. Coppola goes too far, of course, so everything becomes a mob-ridden morass. But the first movie is so powerful because he creates an uneasy balance: without dismissing this family romance, he laces it with horrific burdens. The family promises to protect, defend and preserve its members against all disruptions from outside and at all costs.

In crime as in life, however, it is impossible; generations change; the cost is too high, the pressures too great; rot seeps in. Respect can become just a currency upon which one's life depends; obedience and loyalty can become the requisites of love. Those warm bonds of the Corleone families hide jealousies and lies, betrayals and transgressions. Under the sentimental surfaces roll barely controlled forces; the haven can seem a hell.

This doesn't turn us against the family because we seem too close to them, as if they were our own relations. They are also, in part, right about the dangers they face. Mr.

Coppola keeps contradictory feelings swirling about, so the film becomes what its producer, Albert S. Ruddy, initially envisioned: "an ice-blue terrifying movie about people you love."

The terror is the terror of betrayal; the love keeps asserting that there is hope. And in this, "The Godfather" hit upon one of the great themes of American life in this century: the challenge of becoming American. This challenge lies underneath the plots of many gangster films; it is even one of the issues lying behind the formation of ethnic gangs in immigrant communities. How is the passage to be made from family to society, from ethnic culture to American life, from the bonds of blood to bonds of citizenship?

Michael thinks he can do it, but he fails. Mr. Coppola eventually seems to argue that it isn't worth doing. And the movie shows us, again and again, the tragedy implicit in trying and in not trying, the tenuous nature of any social order, the evils that can erupt whether rushing ahead or desperately trying to remain behind.

Japan ponders dilemma of baby shortage

Faced with ominous forecasts of a fast-aging population, Japan is pondering the delicate dilemma of what to do about its shortage of babies. Policy-makers are being advised to tread lightly with proposals, given the danger of echoing war-time nationalist efforts to boost the birthrate.

"There should be policies to remove obstacles preventing people from having children when they want to," said Atsuko Muraki, an official at the prime minister's Office for Gender Equality.

"But there is a strong allergy in Japan to promoting a higher birthrate for the sake of the nation because of the wartime policy. What's important is to protect the freedom to choose different options," she said.

Male lawmakers have in the past angered women voters with comments on the matter, which grabbed wide attention some eight years ago when the birthrate first hit a historic low. Prime Minister Ryutaro Hashimoto, for one, irritated feminists when, as a cabinet minister, he blamed better jobs and education for women for the falling birthrate.

"There are a lot of politicians who make unreasonable comments suggesting the problem could be solved if women would just go ahead and have more children," said Yuriko Ashino, deputy executive director of the Family Planning Federation of Japan.

"But as I know from my own experience and other women I know, there are many obstacles, even for those who want to have children. What's needed is to create an environment that makes it easier to have children if one wants to," she said.

"Steps should be taken immediately to stem the falling birthrate," said an editorial in the financial daily Nihon Keizai Shimbun. "This is not only because a lower birthrate erodes the foundation of the social-welfare system and depresses economic activity, but also because it is not a sound society that discourages women from having children," the paper said.

Worried about the economic and social fallout from too few babies, Health and Welfare Minister Junichiro Koizumi has set up a panel of experts to discuss the matter and seek public feedback. "If the problem gets worse it could have a serious impact on Japanese society and the economy," Koizumi said recently.

But making it easier for women to have more children if they wish will be tough, given a long list of obstacles which are deeply embedded in Japanese society.

High on the list is a growing disenchantment among women with the state of matrimony itself. "Nearly half of all Japanese women in their late 20s are not married, while about 20 percent of those in their early 30s are also single. And in Japan if you don't get married, you don't have children," said Nobuko Manabe, deputy director of the policy planning division of the ministry's secretariat.

In part, that low marriage rate reflects improving, if still unequal, opportunities for women in the work force and their resulting greater economic independence. Marriage itself, meanwhile, seems to have got a bad name. "There is little expectation that one's lifestyle will improve after marriage," Manabe said. "Marriage has a bad image."

That may not be surprising, given that most women who marry are saddled with the bulk of the burden of housework and child-rearing, even if they keep outside jobs. "In the old days, men went to work outside and women took care of the home. Now men go to work, while women work outside and take care of the home. So a married woman has a very heavy burden," said the Office of Gender Equality's Muraki - herself a working mother of two.

"By comparison, young women who work and live with their parents have very easy lives," she said.

For those who do marry, economic and social factors including employment practices and the high cost of education and housing can make childbearing a daunting prospect.

A decade-old Equal Employment Opportunity Act, for example, has done little to persuade firms to abandon the practice of pressuring women to quit when they have children.

"It is still rare to see a pregnant woman walking around an office," Muraki said. "The prevailing view at companies is still that it is inconvenient to employ women with families."

And despite a public daycare system that is enviable by US standards, typically long working hours make it tough to work full-time and raise a family.

The high cost of education for those seeking success for their children in a society where a degree from a top-ranked university means a job at elite firms or government agencies also discourages many potential parents.

"Bringing up children in a society where competition to get a good education is so intense is a heavy burden, both financially and psychologically," said the Family Planning Federation's Ashino.

Crowded housing conditions and the high cost of buying a home also discourage many couples from having more than one or two offspring, although many still profess that their "ideal" family includes three children, survey data shows.

Clearing away such obstacles, experts agree, would require a virtual re-engineering of Japanese society, and hence is a policy puzzle that one advisory panel can hardly solve.

"This is a very private issue and not one the state can simply decide on itself," said Manabe. "That's why we want to encourage discussion, make the debate public and get more views from the people." (Reuters)

Return to terror

By PINHAS INBAFI

The resumption of terror attacks by Hamas cannot simply be explained by the controversy over Har Homa and further redeployment. This merely serves as an excuse to "justify" terrorism. The real reason is that the whole framework of Oslo is now coming under intense reexamination within Palestinian circles; we have already witnessed Abu Mazen's decision to resign as chief negotiator with Israel.

Both Moslem fundamentalists and secular organizations came to this conclusion last month at the "national dialogue" meeting in Nablus. Elements in the PA claim that, with the demise of the Oslo agreement - which originally provided the PA with legitimacy - there was nothing now to prevent the resumption of terror activity.

The decision to resume attacks came not only as result of the political deadlock, but as an outcome of the internal difficulties of Hamas.

The Moslem Brothers movement, both in the Palestinian territories and in Jordan, is currently undergoing a crisis on the question of whether to join the respective Jordanian and Palestinian regimes. The older generation of the Moslem Brothers on both sides of the River Jordan is mostly in favor of entering the political arena, while the younger generation is more radical and opposed.

In Jordan, there is an additional factor: while the veteran leadership of Moslem Brothers is tightly connected to the regime, and is Jordanian by origin, the younger generation is mostly Palestinian and has little connection to the Hashemites.

The older generation is grateful to the Hashemites for sheltering them when they were persecuted by the nationalist regimes that flourished throughout the Middle East. For the younger activists, however, this is remote history. Some Moslem Brothers in Gaza and the West Bank have already joined the PA against the objection of others, mainly Dr. Abd al-Aziz a-Rantisi, who is currently in jail in Israel.

In Jordan, the dispute was manifested during the last days of Kabarti's government when he tried to persuade the Moslem Brothers to join his government. While the "traditional" leadership was eager to join, the move was blocked by the younger generation. A similar situation applies in the Palestinian areas. The old leadership there does not want to quarrel with the PA, but the young generation is eager to go into battle.

A generational clash within Hamas is one reason behind the resumption of terror

the Palestinian areas. The old leadership there does not want to quarrel with the PA, but the young generation is eager to go into battle.

This internal dispute overshadowed the participation of the Hamas delegation at the national dialogue in Nablus. This controversy was reflected in one of the latest editions of a-Sabeel, the Moslem Brothers weekly in Amman.

On the one hand, it published formal permission for the Hamas politburo delegation to go to Nablus; on the other, it published a fierce attack on the same dialogue meeting. In last week's edition, Sheikh Jamal Mansur, Hamas's spokesman at the meeting, threatened all parties in the region, "including the Zionist enemy," of aiming to split Hamas.

Hamas did not go to the national dialogue fully convinced by this. The evidence can be found in the latest edition of a-Sabeel, where there are articles in defense of Hamas's participation in the dialogue, alongside articles condemning it.

It is important to understand what Sheikh Mansur meant when he referred to the attempts to create a split inside the movement. Prior to the national dialogue in Nablus one of Hamas's leaders in Gaza, Dr. Mahmud Zahhar, suggested the creation of a politburo in the PA-controlled territories, separate from the one already existing in Damascus. This suggestion was furiously rejected by the members of the Hamas politburo in Amman.

One of the main points they mentioned was that the suggestion was actually an attempt by the PA to create a split inside Hamas between the "inside" leadership, and the "diaspora."

The dispute on whether or not to join Kabarti's former government was actually a parallel to the radical wing of mostly young Palestinians in Jordan conceives it as an attempt to split the movement down the middle.

Sheikh Mansur confirmed that Hamas not only denies the validity of the Oslo Agreements, but sticks to "resistance" to occupation as a suitable way to meet the needs of the current stage.

The return to terrorism now looks like the proper way for the younger generation inside Hamas to accelerate the change of generations in the Hamas leadership.

Saudis produce Arab world's first modern encyclopedia

For the first time in the modern era, the Arab world has a large-scale encyclopedia that looks at the world from an Islamic perspective, yielding some definitions at odds with typical Western views.

The Global Arabic Encyclopedia, a lavishly printed, 30-volume set financed by a Saudi Arabian prince, was introduced at this year's Cairo International Book Fair.

Its 16,000-plus pages contain more than 20,800 entries and some 18,000 photographs, maps and charts.

For all that, some subjects get short shrift.

Israel, for example, is dealt with in less than a page, while lengthy sections describe each Arab nation. And Israel's founding comes off as less heroic than depicted in popular Western books and movies, such as Leon Uris's Exodus.

The encyclopedia says Israel is "a state which was set up by the Zionists with support from international powers on the land of the Arab Palestinians on May 14, 1948, and its population are foreigners and aliens to the land of Palestine."

The Saudi who supervised the work, Stanford-educated Ahmed Medhadi al-Shuwaikhat, said the encyclopedia is an attempt to meet the intellectual needs of Arabs, meaning it does not simply echo beliefs "which are alien to the Arab world."

"Human knowledge follows a certain epistemological framework, and our aim was to make the entries suitable and interesting to our Arab readers," he said in an interview.

Most entries are similar to those in any standard encyclopedia, although scientific sections give emphasis to Arab contributions, especially to early astronomy, medicine and mathematics.

Al-Shuwaikhat said the publishers bought rights to the World Book Encyclopedia, and 1,000 experts, translators and editors spent six and a half years adapting and rewriting the work for Arabic publication.

As an example of cutting entries to fit Arab interests, al-Shuwaikhat said the Saudi version has six pages on the United States, not the 100 in the original. He said the Arabic work stresses that American Indians were pushed aside by European colonizers.

By contrast, the encyclopedia refers to the early Moslems who expanded their empire east and west as liberators, not conquerors. It points out that the Islamization of North Africa was accomplished largely by merchants and Islam's mystical Sufis - not by soldiers.

It's surprising the encyclopedia, financed by Prince Sultan bin Abdul-Aziz al-Saud, the Saudi defense minister and a brother of King Fahd, is the first such modern-day Arabic work. The Arabs, after all, were legendary scholars and translators in ancient times.

The "House of Wisdom" was created in Iraq in 830 CE to translate Greek works. Arabic translations were what preserved Greek knowledge and philosophy during Europe's Dark Ages.

In 950, an organization called the Brotherhood of Purity in Basra, Iraq, wrote 51 treatises that amounted to an encyclopedia of that era's knowledge of theology, philosophy and natural sciences.

The A-to-Z encyclopedia common today came into being - in both French and English - only in the 18th century. Arabic Alif-to-Yaa works of the 19th century were not of the scope of the new Saudi set.

Not surprisingly, the Saudi encyclopedia devotes vast space to Islam, its history and cultural impact, which the publishers believe have been ignored or distorted by Western publications.

In one area, the encyclopedia may disappoint many in the Moslem world.

Saudi Arabia's rulers are Sunni Moslems, the largest Islamic sect, and Sunni beliefs and teachings are sprinkled throughout the many entries on Islam. But Shi'ites, the second largest sect, are given only half a page.

The encyclopedia also ignores certain groups in defining terrorism. As examples, it mentions the Italian Red Brigades, the Irish Republican Army and Jewish groups like Etzel and Lehi involved in Israel's independence struggle.

Nothing is said, however, about Islamic radical groups, even those that twice in the past two years bombed American targets in the Saudi kingdom.

The encyclopedia, bound in Islamic green leather with gold titles, sells for 6,000 Saudi riyals ($1,600). A computerized English edition is planned on CD-ROM.

Al-Shuwaikhat refused to say how much it cost to produce the encyclopedia, saying only that it was a "few million dollars." (AP)

EARTHLY CONCERNS

The high price of global illiteracy

By DVORA BEN SHAIL

One out of every four adults in the world is unable to read or write in any language. More than half of these illiterate people are women.

But these figures may be inaccurate. Countries usually supply their own statistics on illiteracy and in many cases the figures are unintentionally low. One case in point is the United States, which reports 78 percent adult literacy, but a survey of 20,000 US citizens in 35 cities and towns, by the Betty Ford Foundation, found that 42 percent of adults between the ages of 15 to 30 could not read well enough to follow a simple set of directions, read a two-inch newspaper article and explain what it said, or read a simple business letter.

The reason for this discrepancy is that wherever there is compulsory education it is assumed that all children go to school. It is further assumed that any child who goes to school for at least five years is literate. Consequently, governments arrive at the literacy rate by deducting a small percentage for children with severe mental handicaps, and reporting the rest as literate. But this is not always the case.

Illiteracy in women carries an especially high price tag.

Studies done by the UN have shown that literate women are 85 percent more likely to be successful in contraceptive use. It has also been noted that female education is one of the greatest incentives to lowering birth rates, lowering infant mortality (which spurs many women to conceive more frequently) and to pulling families above the poverty line.

But there is another area in which literacy, and especially female literacy, is important.

In Asia, Africa and South America, the three places that have the highest literacy rates, women work in agriculture. In these underdeveloped areas, the use of harmful pesticides is drastically increasing and insecticides and herbicides banned in more developed countries are dumped on the market, sold without any restriction and used by people who cannot even read the labels, let alone the cautionary information. This factor alone accounts for the very high number of poisonings that happen every year in developing countries. The figure is especially high among women and children and in some places ranks as a cause of death that exceeds all other forms of accidental death.

Because of these considerations, UNESCO has classified illiteracy as one of the world's most pressing problems, from both a social and environmental standpoint.

Rafael to become state company

Finance Minister Dan Meridor and Defense Minister Yitzhak Mordechai agreed yesterday to continue with the process of granting Rafael (the Armaments Development Authority) the status of a state company.

The army was forced to cover a 1996 company budget deficit at Rafael of NIS 315 million. The government's taking over direct responsibility will ease much of the current financial strain on the IDF. Rafael's total deficit is greater than NIS 1 billion.

Global Wireless to buy Nexus's warrants

Global Wireless Communications of New York has announced it will purchase $4.5 million of Nexus Telecommunication Systems Ltd.'s warrants as a part of a plan to form a strategic alliance. Based in Givatayim, Nexus develops two-way, wireless communications networks, including a two-way pager that allows users to receive and send messages.

The warrants will be exercisable into three million common shares of Nexus at a price of $5.35 each. The exercise period for the warrants is five years. Once Global Wireless, a privately held, New York-based telecommunications company, exercises the options, they will be obliged to invest an additional $11.5m. in Nexus. Under the terms of the deal, Global Wireless will distribute Nexus products and services in emerging countries, mostly in the expanding markets of the Far East and South America.

The Nasdaq Stock Market-traded company recently announced a $2m. deal to sell its two-way paging system to a southeast Asian telecommunications operator.

Bezeq: Bid to buy NetVision not rejected

Bezeq spokeswoman Ella Bar-Or denied media reports that the Communications Ministry is refusing to accept the company's bid to purchase 50 percent of the Internet service provider NetVision.

Negotiations for Bezeq's 50% acquisition of Internet service provider NetVision have broken down, due to the ministry's refusal to approve the deal, according to Globe's business daily.

The newspaper suggested the ministry's main reason for refusing to approve the deal was that it would bring about the unification of two monopolies, although neither is officially recognized as such. NetVision has a current subscriber base of 40,000 and is a de facto monopoly in the Internet communications field.

Over 10% of available housing unoccupied

According to a 1995 census, more than 10% of available housing was unoccupied during that year, the Central Bureau of Statistics recently announced. The census also revealed that more than 100,000 apartments are used for purposes other than housing. The CBS said the oversupply of housing occurred in areas where large number of people left to resettle in other cities or large numbers of housing starts had been completed, but new populations had not yet moved in. The census found that 12.1% of all the empty housing is situated beyond the Green Line.

Cellcom subscribers now listed with 144

Phone numbers of hundreds of thousands of Cellcom cellular phone subscribers are now available by calling Bezeq's 144 number. The registry took months of compilation work, as Cellcom had to ask every subscriber for permission to make his or her number public.

The cost of obtaining a number from 144 is four phone units, and from a cellular phone, four units plus air time. A few months ago, Pelephone put its subscribers' names on the 144 list, unless they specifically objected to being included.

Retail and chainstore sales increased 0.7% in February, in keeping with the pace set in January, the Central Bureau of Statistics recently reported. The CBS estimates that sales for the year will rise 8%-9%. Last year, retail sales jumped 12%, reflecting an average monthly growth rate of 0.9%. Retail food sales for February rose 0.8%, a 0.1% decrease from January.

Central bank leaves interest rates unchanged

By DAVID HARRIS

There will be no change in the Bank of Israel's key lending rate next month, governor Jacob Frenkel announced yesterday.

This leaves the key rate at 13.9 percent, with the aggregate cut since August holding at 3.1%.

Since its 1996 peak of 17% at the start of July, the bank has failed to reduce interest rates by more than a percentage point in any month.

The decision comes amid increasing pressure on the central bank to lower rates, which industrialists say are hampering export growth and stifling the economy, which is in a protracted state of slowdown.

With M1 money supply rising 3% last month, following a 3.4% increase in January, there was even media speculation of a possible hike in interest rates for April. M1, which includes the sum of currency, demand deposits and travelers checks, significantly reflects the credit given by the banks to the business sector.

This data, along with the 1.2% increase in the Consumer Price Index, announced earlier this month by the Central Bureau of Statistics, were significant factors in persuading Frenkel not to listen to the pleas for a reduction.

Foremost in Frenkel's opinion is the need to meet the government-set 1997 inflation target of 7% to 10%.

The bank argues its tight monetary policy led to a substantial reduction in the inflation rate in the latter half of last year. In June the annual rate was some 15%, but by December it was down to 7%, with the actual annual total at 10.6%, just over the government-set target.

On the basis of the January and February Consumer Price indexes (totaling 1.6%), inflation is heading for an estimated 10%-11%.

However, CBS spokesman David Neumann warned against making an annual prediction based on the first two months, especially since the index was affected by seasonal factors and considerable jumps in the dollar exchange rate.

In an effort to dampen fears of escalating inflation, Neumann also pointed out that in the first two months last year the index totalled 1.8%, yet by December the annual rate had been reigned in.

Frenkel again used the key rate publication as an opportunity to remind the Finance Ministry of what the bank sees as the "urgent need" to reduce the budget deficit to keep at the Knesset-approved 2.3% of gross domestic product.

A decision on whether an additional 1997 budget cut will be made (on top of the NIS 7.2 billion cut agreed on December 31 last year), will only be taken after Finance Minister Dan Meridor has considered the budgetary data for the first quarter, he said again last week.

The economy has been in recession since the second half of last year, when there was a 2% growth rate in the economy but a more significant increase in the size of population. Ya'acov Sheinin of Economic Models consultancy told reporters immediately after the interest rate announcement.

The bank should have reduced interest rates by 1.5%, with another 1.5% in the coming months, said Manufacturers Association president Dan Propper. "The Bank of Israel is just not reading the economic map correctly," he said.

Eliyahu buys 36% stake in Ayalon Ins.

By GALIT LIPKIS BECK

Shlomo Eliyahu Holdings, controlled by businessman Shlomo Eliyahu, has purchased 36 percent of Ayalon Insurance for $11 million.

Ayalon is a medium-sized insurance firm established in 1976 by the Rachmani family. The company's share of the general insurance field and life insurance market is about 5%.

The shares were purchased on Thursday from controlling shareholder Levy Rachmani, at a price 13% above the market value.

The transaction was on a basis of a company value of $30m.

Eliyahu said the purchase is intended as a long-term investment. Shlomo Eliyahu Holdings controls 100% of Eliyahu Insurance and 30% of Phoenix shares.

The deal is expected to help both Eliyahu Insurance and Ayalon compete in the insurance market, which is dominated by five large insurance groups and has recently faced new competition from firms operating in the direct insurance field.

Under the agreement, Ayalon and Eliyahu will operate as independent companies but cooperate in areas intended to reduce operating expenses such as computer costs and product development.

Rachmani will hold 52% of Ayalon's share capital after the sale.

It was agreed that Rachmani will continue to serve as general manager of the company, while Noga Rachmani will remain deputy general manager.

The deal is subject to the approval of the supervisor of insurance at the Finance Ministry and the restraint of trade commissioner at the Industry and Trade Ministry. Eliyahu and Rachmani signed a 10-year voting agreement whereby the Rachmani family will continue to hold a minimum 35.7% of Ayalon's share capital and Eliyahu a minimum 25.1%.

Advocate Ram Caspi represented Eliyahu in the transaction, while the Rachmani family was represented by Prof. Yossi Gross.

Teva Medical, Israel Int'l Fund, Taoz in joint venture

By JENNIFER FRIEDLIN

Teva Medical, Israel International Fund and Taoz announced plans yesterday to invest $4.5 million in a joint venture to establish community medical centers internationally.

Using Teva Medical's development, the centers will provide dialysis treatments for people suffering from kidney ailments.

According to international figures, 500 out of every one million people worldwide suffer from kidney problems and require dialysis treatments two or three times a week.

"We believe community dialysis centers answer a basic need that unfortunately will grow rather than disappear in the coming years," said Isaac Davash, director-general of the Israel International Fund. "Teva Medical has interesting know-how not yet found in the marketplace."

The six-month-old, $30m. fund, a joint venture between Bank Discount and the UK's Hambros Bank, invests in Israeli firms whose products mostly go for export.

Teva Medical, a subsidiary of Teva Pharmaceutical Industries based in Ashdod, manufactures and markets medical devices. In addition to dialysis treatments, it makes products used in blood transfusions, blood banks and home treatments.

Taoz is a local private company that provides medical services.

The joint venture's first center is scheduled to open in an undisclosed European country within the next two weeks.

Bank Discount share offer slated for next month

By GALIT LIPKIS BECK

Finance Minister Dan Meridor yesterday asked the Finance Committee to reapprove the sale of 17 percent of Bank Discount's shares to the public based on the annual report for 1996.

The government intends to issue shares in the country's third largest bank in April, more than a month after the planned date.

The sale marks the second phase in the government's privatization of Bank Discount, which started at the beginning of last year, when the government reduced its interest to 72% from 87%.

The bank hopes to submit its prospectus to the Securities Authority for approval during the first week of April in an attempt to complete the sale in the middle of the month.

The issue is expected to raise about NIS 600m., of which 28% would be in ready cash, 32% in three months and the remaining 40% within nine months after the issue.

A more accurate estimation of the proceeds will be known closer to the publication of the bank's prospectus, based on the shares market value.

The government will offer a package made up of the bank's shares and two types of call options, one with a three-month exercise date from the date of the offering and the other with a nine-month exercise date.

Bank Discount workers will be able to purchase 10% of the share issue, at the offering price.

The issue will be backed by a consortium of some 30 to 50 underwriters headed by IBI underwriters, Eyal, Lidar and Clal Issues.

Before the public share issue, there will be an institutional tender for the bank's capital notes.

The issue was initially planned for the first quarter of 1997, but at the last moment it was postponed due to the Securities Authorities demand that Discount Bank include in its prospectus the accurate sum of additional allowances for doubtful debts made in the fourth quarter last year.

The bank was unable to disclose the figures by the end of February, which was the deadline for publishing a prospectus based on nine month financial statements.

As a result, Bank Discount—at the request of MI Holdings which is in charge of the government's sale of the banks—agreed to bring forward the publication date of its quarterly and annual report to today from next Monday.

It is speculated that Discount Bank's fourth quarter 1996 results were adversely influenced by difficulties encountered in the real estate sector.

Soybeans fall sharply

By CLIFF EDWARDS

CHICAGO (AP) — Soybean futures prices fell sharply Friday on the Chicago Board of Trade, after an industry report indicated prices at their highest in more than eight years — have forced domestic processors to curtail usage. Wheat futures also retreated.

On other commodity markets, pork futures soared a second day, while coffee futures fell sharply.

The National Oilseed Processors Association reported a sharp decline for the first time in several months in the amount of soybeans crushed for making soybean meal and oil. The association reported the crush fell to 28.1 million bushels in the week ended March 19 from 30.1 million bushels a week earlier.

That coincides with announcements that Archer Daniels Midland Co. and Cargill have curtailed processing operations because it has become too expensive to make soybean oil.

The news erased the gains made a day earlier, after the Agriculture Department reported continued strong international demand for American soybeans and related products, despite stepped-up Brazilian harvesting and exports.

"We know at some point in time that we shift export demand from the US to South America as they come on stream with their harvest," said analyst Gerald Zussel at E.D. and F. Man International Inc.

"People have been anticipating that transition for three to four weeks now and it hasn't come. But this crush number could be the first sign the transition is starting to take hold."

Soybeans also retreated on reports Brazilian soybeans were destined for the US, which could relieve any tightness that may occur in coming months. The USDA is projecting American reserves will fall to a 20-year low of 140 million bushels by September 1.

Wheat futures retreated amid forecasts calling for moderating weather in key growing regions that should lessen chances of flood damage to the winter crop and improve prospects for timely spring plantings.

Soybeans for May delivery fell 9 1/2 cents to $3.42 1/2 a bushel; July wheat fell seven cents to $3.82 1/2 a bushel.

Pork futures prices rose sharply a second day on the Chicago Mercantile Exchange in reaction to Taiwan's voluntary ban on pork exports following the discovery of foot-and-mouth disease on 20 farms.

The disease causes blisters on the animal's tongue and feet and leads to weight loss. It cannot be transmitted to humans.

Still, Japan on Friday banned imports of Taiwanese pork, which increased speculation US pork producers will be asked to fill the gap.

Taiwan accounted for 41% of Japanese pork imports last year, with American imports accounting for 22%. The ban could last for five years, a Taiwanese agriculture official said, significantly boosting US export prospects.

German economics minister raps Saudi investment rules

By CAROLINE DREES

RIYADH (Reuters) — German Economics Minister Guenter Rexrodt over the weekend called on Saudi Arabia — Germany's main trading partner in the Arab world — to improve investment conditions in the kingdom to boost bilateral trade.

"Compared to Germany's other major trading partners, German investment in Saudi Arabia is still modest," he said at the opening speech of the 12th meeting of the German-Saudi joint commission on economic and technical cooperation. "The legal and administrative structure in your country are not always clear enough for foreign investors. And the need to find a sponsor in Saudi Arabia discourages some investors," he said.

The two-day meeting was last convened in Berlin in 1994.

"I believe that the global market for investment will make it more important for Saudi Arabia to make the best possible conditions for investments," Rexrodt said.

Oil giant Saudi Arabia said earlier this month it was taking measures to encourage foreign investment.

This included steps to provide protection for foreign investment and ease bureaucratic obstacles in the licensing of foreign projects.

It is also reviewing its foreign capital law to introduce more incentives to international investors in a country where most foreign capital is invested in joint ventures with Saudi firms.

Foreign capital can be invested without Saudi participation, but then it does not qualify for a range of incentives, including tax holiday.

According to German embassy figures, total bilateral trade between Germany and Saudi Arabia was around DM 4.8 billion ($2.8 billion) in 1995, down from DM 5.7b. in 1994. In the first nine months of 1996 it stood at DM 3.7b.

Rexrodt also said he welcomed and supported Saudi Arabia's bid to join the World Trade Organization (WTO).

"I hope that Saudi Arabia can soon fulfill the conditions for membership and become a member of WTO," he said.

Rexrodt, who will travel to the United Arab Emirates from Saudi Arabia, also said the German government wanted to see more liberalization of economic ties between the European Union and the Middle East.

"A free trade zone between the European Union and the countries of the Gulf Cooperation Council (GCC) would be an important step," he said.

The GCC is a political and economic alliance formed by regional heavyweight Saudi Arabia, the United Arab Emirates, Qatar, Bahrain, Oman and Kuwait.

The failure of Gulf Arab states to unify their tariffs has been a key hurdle blocking a free trade deal with the EU, which could open lucrative European markets to cheap petrochemicals and other goods from the Gulf.

GCC and European foreign ministers agreed in April to set a deadline of no more than two years to complete a free trade agreement between the two trading partners — an issue under discussions for more than 10 years.

Hashimoto: No to Russia as full G-7 member

TOKYO (AP) — Japanese Prime Minister Ryutaro Hashimoto does not believe Russia is ready to join the leaders of the world's leading industrial democracies in discussing development, international finance and trade, Kyodo News reported yesterday.

Speaking with reporters at his official residence yesterday, Hashimoto expressed caution about giving Russia full membership in the Group of Seven, the Japanese news agency said.

Russian President Boris Yeltsin already has been invited to the G-7's annual summit this June in Denver, but still will not be granted full membership.

US President Bill Clinton is calling the session the "Summit of the Eight." Hashimoto said he favors continued Russian participation in the "G-7 plus one" talks begun in 1991 on selected issues, dealing with politics, the environment and the fight against terrorism, Kyodo said.

Officials at Hashimoto's office could not be reached for confirmation.

Kyodo said that in a telephone conversation with Clinton last week before his summit meeting with Yeltsin, Hashimoto reminded the American president of Japan's territorial dispute with Russia.

Japan wants Russia to return several small northern islands seized by Soviet troops in the closing days of World War II in 1945. The issue has prevented the two sides from concluding a peace treaty formally ending the hostilities of that war.

Hashimoto is to confer today with US Vice President Al Gore, who arrived yesterday for a visit.

US exec embezzled at least $80 million from Japanese firm

TOKYO (AP) — A Japanese meat packer said an executive at its US subsidiary embezzled between $80 million and $100m. over seven years through off-the-book borrowing from banks, Japanese media reported yesterday.

Hiroshi Okoso, the president of the subsidiary's parent, Osaka-based Nippon Meat Packers Inc., revealed the alleged embezzlement Saturday, the reports said.

Okoso said his company believed the executive, who he identified as Yasuyoshi Kato, 39, misappropriated the money to purchase real estate and stocks, the nationally-circulated Yomiuri newspaper reported.

Kato, 39, is a board member of Day-Lee Foods Inc., a subsidiary of Nippon Meat Packers, and has been on loan to the subsidiary since 1982, the reports said, quoting Okoso.

Kato is believed to have started borrowing the money around 1990 from several Japanese banks in California, where the subsidiary is located, without permission from the company but on the pretext of needing it for company use, the reports quoted Okoso as saying.

Nippon Meat Packers first learned of Kato's alleged embezzlement after tax authorities in the US notified the company Wednesday, Kyodo News reported, quoting Okoso.

Day-Lee Foods was established in 1977 and processes, imports and exports meat and agricultural products, the Yomiuri said.

Okoso said it has annual sales of $485 million, the paper reported.

With reserves of nearly 109 billion yen, besides capital, the embezzlement losses won't affect Nippon Meat Packers' operations, the Yomiuri quoted Okoso as telling reporters.

Okoso also said that Nippon Meat Packers will file a writ of attachment for Kato's personal assets in court in California today, the Yomiuri reported. He also said the company is considering filing claims for compensation, the newspaper said.

Nippon Meat Packers is one of Japan's top three meat processors and owns the Nippon Ham Fighters, a Japanese professional baseball team.

Microsoft aims for Windows year-end release

SEATTLE (Reuters) — Microsoft Corp. developers hope to release an update to the Windows 95 operating system by the end of the year, despite industry reports that the release date has slipped into 1998, officials said over the weekend.

Phil Holden, product manager for the system update code-named "Memphis," said developers are on track to release a beta test version in the second quarter.

"We're working as hard as we can to make it a '97 product," Holden said. But he said the final release date would depend on feedback from testers.

Memphis, also known as Windows 97 or Windows 9x, is expected to be a significant retail product because of major changes, including a new interface integrated with the forthcoming version 4.0 of Microsoft's Internet Explorer browser.

Holden said the product would include other changes aimed at enhancing Internet functionality, as well as support for new hardware standards, including digital video disks.

"We definitely expect significant retail purchases," said Holden.

Two trade industry publications said in their online versions this week that the release date of Memphis, also known as Windows 97, had slipped.

One of the publications, Computer Reseller News, said Microsoft officials had begun warning computer manufacturers not to expect the Memphis system to be available in time for the December holiday season.

Microsoft chairman Bill Gates this month confirmed that the next version of the company's high-end Windows NT operating system would not be available until sometime in the first half of 1998, later than originally anticipated.

Holden said the delayed release of the Windows NT update would not affect timing of the Windows 9x product, which is aimed more at consumers and small businesses.

"Longer term we definitely have a goal of trying to synchronize the releases," Holden said. "But the core goal at the moment is to try to get the products out as soon as we can."

Kohl rejects reshuffle talk, Euro delay

BONN (Reuters) — Germany's Chancellor Helmut Kohl, facing record unemployment and deadlock over sweeping tax reforms, yesterday dismissed rumors of a cabinet reshuffle and insisted the launch of Europe's single currency would go ahead on time.

The German leader told newspaper Welt am Sonntag he was certain his "excellent" team was capable of tackling the tasks that lay ahead of them. His optimistic remarks were his last before taking off for his annual Easter fitness holiday in the Austrian Alps.

Kohl said his ruling coalition was prepared to meet the opposition Social Democrats (SPD) for consensus talks on the much-needed tax reforms at any time, even before next weekend's Easter holiday, and blasted them for exploiting the deadlock to boost their standing ahead of the 1998 general election.

"We have 4.7 million unemployed and it's clear to everyone that we just don't have the time to wait for the SPD... to make up their minds," Kohl told the newspaper.

Although Kohl's coalition holds a majority of seats in the Bundestag lower house of parliament, the SPD can block most tax measures through its majority in the Bundesrat upper house.

Kohl warned SPD leaders, who pulled out of tax talks with the government in a clash over coal subsidy cuts two weeks ago, he would only resume talks without preconditions and that their blockade tactics could damage society's future chances.

"I would hope and trust that the Social Democrats would have the rational power to see these issues through," he said.

But SPD leader Oskar Lafontaine said he too was ready to meet Kohl at any time, saying the government had failed to come up with acceptable proposals and that joblessness was sky-high because of huge non-wage labor costs employers had to pay.

"We don't want tax cuts for people who will put the extra cash in savings accounts, but for employers and families, who will spend it tomorrow," Lafontaine told ZDF television.

Kohl argued the 1998 tax bill, that envisages tax cuts of DM 30 billion a year, would provide a crucial boost to flagging domestic investment and the desperate job situation.

The measures are also seen as essential to help whip Germany's finances into shape for European monetary union (EMU) due to be launched on January 1, 1999.

Air France pilots vote to delay strike

PARIS (Reuters) — Air France pilots, drawing back from a showdown which might have forced the resignation of airline chairman Christian Blanc, voted to delay a four-day strike scheduled to begin yesterday.

"Seventy percent of the pilots at the general assembly voted for a delay in the strike," an Air France spokeswoman said.

Blanc had threatened to resign if the stoppage went ahead. He had estimated the strike would cost FR 1 billion, dashing his hopes of piloting Air France to financial breakeven this year and an early privatization.

The pilot's decision was confirmed in a vote by union representatives. Geoffrey Bouvet, head of the SNPL union, said 21 delegates had approved a motion to delay the strike by two months, seven opposed it, and five abstained.

Unions had called the strike from March 23 to 26 to protest against Blanc's plan to hire 450 younger pilots on lower wages.

Blanc wants to cut the flight crew wage bill by 15 percent, to bring it into line with its European and US rivals as part of a three-year plan to boost competitiveness. The company is under pressure to reduce costs, with the European air travel market opening up to full competition next month.

Air France had proposed to hire new pilots at a starting annual gross salary of FR 220,000, compared to the start-up pay of FR 330,000 that current pilots received when they began their careers.

According to French news reports, the new starting wage is higher than those of Lufthansa and British Airways and nearly 40% above starting wages at American Airlines.

Stoichkov: I won't play for Bulgaria

SOFIA (Reuters) - Volatile striker Hristo Stoichkov, who has not turned up for Bulgaria's World Cup qualifiers so far, said he would not play against Cyprus on April 2, it was reported yesterday. Stoichkov quit the team last year demanding the resignation of the country's soccer chiefs.

"They (soccer chiefs) are now sending me a telegram to return but I will not do it," local media quoted Stoichkov as saying.

Tergat, Tulu win cross country titles

TURIN (Reuters) - Kenya's Paul Tergat won his third consecutive senior men's world cross country title yesterday. Tergat had a thrilling duel over the final two kilometres of the 12.333 km race with Morocco's Salah Hissou before pulling away with the line in sight.

Tergat won in 35 minutes 11 seconds with Hissou second and Kenya's Thomas Nyariki third. Derartu Tulu of Ethiopia regained her senior women's world cross country title. The 1995 champion judged her effort to perfection with a sprint for the finish 200 metres from the line. She won the 6.7 km race in 20 minutes 53 seconds.

The title looked to be between the defending champion Ethiopia's Gete Wami and Britain's Paula Radcliffe, who had broken away from the rest of the field in the final kilometre, until Tulu dug deep with her late surge. Radcliffe was second in 20:55 with Wami third in 21:00.

Johannsson wins St. Petersburg Open

ST. PETERSBURG, Russia (Reuters) - Thomas Johannsson of Sweden beat Italian Rocco Furlan 6-3, 6-4 yesterday to win the $300,000 St. Petersburg Open men's tennis tournament.

Johannsson, 22, who beat favorite Michael Stich of Germany in the semifinals, said he was enjoying one of the best playing periods in his career.

"The last two weeks are the best in my life," the fifth-seeded Swede told a news conference. "I have never played better than now."

Johannsson won the first set easily, but Furlan put up a fight in the second, leading 4-3 until the Swede found his best service and outclassed the Italian.

Newcastle's title hopes fade

LONDON (Reuters) - Newcastle's faint English championship hopes all but disappeared yesterday when they could only draw 1-1 at Wimbledon.

Newcastle remained fourth in the standings with a game in hand but trailed leaders Manchester United by 11 points.

Newcastle have never won at Wimbledon and looked to be heading for defeat when Norwegian Oyvind Leonhardsen's 28th minute shot took a wicked bounce to beat goalkeeper Shaka Hislop.

But the visitors salvaged a point eight minutes into the second half when Colombian Faustino Asprilla curled a free-kick past Neil Sullivan after Frenchman David Ginola had been fouled on the edge of the box.

Yesterday's results: Premier League: Wimbledon 1, Newcastle 1. Division one: Oldham 0, Crystal Palace 1. Division two: Bristol Rovers 1, Preston 0.

SPEEDING AWAY - Fiji's Marika Vunibaka leaves a diving South African player in his wake as he speeds for the try line in the final yesterday.

Fiji win World Cup Sevens

HONG KONG (Reuters) - Fiji, with a biblical inscription on their jerseys to inspire them, fought back from 14-0 behind to beat South Africa 24-21 in the final of the World Cup Sevens yesterday.

The Fijians, winners of a record seven Hong Kong Sevens but eclipsed by New Zealand for the past three years, used their amazing power, pace and vision to overhaul South Africa and prevent them from adding the sevens crown to the World Cup 15s title they lifted in 1995.

Fiji, with the Bible reference "I can do everything through him who gives me strength" pinned on their jerseys, regained their composure after South Africa ran in two early tries.

South Africa put in some great hits in the opening minutes and on the counter-attack scored twice through Free State flanker Andre Venter.

But the lightning-quick Marika Vunibaka pulled a try back before half-time and a sweeping move after the break saw Luke Erenavula score a converted try to level the score at 14-14.

That was the signal for Fiji to up the tempo, and with South Africa running out of steam, Lemeki Koroi scored twice to put the result beyond doubt.

Stephen Brink scored a try which he converted a minute before the end but it was too late for the South Africans.

Fiji were favorites to win the first World Cup Sevens four years ago in Scotland but lost in the semifinals to eventual winners England.

In the quarter-finals, England, with five full internationals in their side, were beaten 21-5 by a hard-tackling and speedy Western Samoa outfit.

Pre-tournament favorites New Zealand were handed their first defeat in Hong Kong in four years when they crashed 31-7 to South Africa in the semifinals.

South Africa were too quick and committed for a New Zealand side who were missing the powerful Jonah Lomu, Christian Cullen and Waisake Masirewa from last year's Hong Kong Sevens winning team.

Four tries from the long-striding Vunibaka powered Fiji into the final with a 38-14 victory over Western Samoa.

DISCONSOLATE - Adam Bacher walks back to the pavilion after he was trapped lbw by Glenn McGrath just six runs short of his maiden Test century.

Cronje gives South Africa edge in final Test

PRETORIA (Reuters) - Belligerent batting from Hansie Cronje followed by aggressive bowling from their pacemen gave South Africa the upper hand on the third day of the third and final Test against Australia at Centurion Park yesterday.

Skipper Cronje's 79 not out took South Africa to 384 and a valuable first innings lead of 157. Brett Schultz and Allan Donald then tripped out the first three Australian batsmen with just 28 on the board to put the home side well on top.

However, South Africa's march towards a face-saving win - they already trail the series 2-0 - was held up in the last session by Mark and Steve Waugh who survived a fierce barrage of fast bowling to add 66 for the fourth wicket.

Steve Waugh was 24 not out but Mark Waugh was dismissed just before the close, bowled by off-spinner Pat Symcox for 42, to leave Australia on 96 for four - still 61 runs adrift.

Even so it was a good day for the home side who had earlier threatened to throw away their overnight advantage.

From 240 for three at the start of play, they slipped to 262 for seven in the morning as Jason Gillespie removed nightwatchman Pat Symcox and Glenn McGrath sent back Jacques Kallis, Adam Bacher and Dave Richardson.

McGrath finished with six for 86 - the sixth time he has taken five or more wickets in his 28 Tests.

Bacher, who had batted so well on Saturday to reach 94 not out, was virtually shotless and added just two in 84 minutes before falling lbw to McGrath four runs short of a maiden Test century.

His 96 lasted seven and a half hours and included 10 fours and a six in 322 balls.

Cronje, however, came to the rescue and added 68 for the eighth wicket with Lance Klusener (30) and 37 for the ninth with Donald (8).

He hit nine fours and two sixes in his 111-ball innings, becoming the first post-isolation South African batsman to score 2,000 runs in Tests when he reached 67.

Australian openers Matthew Hayden and Mark Taylor were sent back in the first five overs to make it 10 for two and when Matthew Elliott lost his middle stump to Donald off an inside edge Australia were reeling.

But the Waughes then held firm in the face of some hostile bowling.

Both were hit several times, Steve being struck twice on the hand and in the chest in one over from Donald and then taking a bouncer from Klusener on the temple guard of his helmet.

Mark Waugh was lucky to survive an lbw appeal from Donald before he had scored and was caught by wicketkeeper Dave Richardson off a Brett Schultz no-ball on 26.

Portland's winning streak ends

LANDOVER, Maryland (AP) - The Portland Trail Blazers' winning streak came to end at 11 games Saturday night as the Washington Bullets scored the final three points from the foul line in a 108-104 victory.

The Blazers hadn't lost since Feb. 26, when they were beaten in overtime at home against New York. Two newspapers then reported that coach P.J. Carlesimo was about to be fired, but the team responded with its winning streak.

Washington's Chris Whitney hit a pair of foul shots with 6.6 seconds left to put the Bullets up by three, and Cliff Robinson's off-balance 30-footer fell short with time winding down. The Bullets made one more foul shot before the final buzzer.

Chris Webber led the Bullets with 26 points before fouling out in the final seconds. Isaiah Rider led the Blazers with a game-high 28 points.

Hornets 100, Warriors 93, OT. In Charlotte, North Carolina, the Hornets struggled in its first game without Anthony Mason, but Vladi Divac assisted on three baskets in a 59-second span in overtime to lift the Hornets' over Golden State.

Divac finished with 10 points, 12 rebounds, nine assists and seven blocks as Charlotte won for the 10th time in 12 games.

Mason, who leads the team in rebounds and is second in scoring and assists, suffered a partially torn tendon in the arch of his right foot Friday night.

Bulls 103, Pistons 88. In Chicago, Scottie Pippen scored 26 points and Michael Jordan had 23 as Chicago kept up its mastery of Detroit.

Luc Longley added 16 points and 12 rebounds and Dennis Rodman grabbed 18 rebounds as the Bulls defeated Detroit for the 19th straight time, a streak that dates back to March 1993.

Saturday's Games: Washington 106, Portland 104; Charlotte 108, Golden State 92; Chicago 103, Detroit 88; Cleveland 75, Dallas 72; Phoenix 104, Houston 99; Milwaukee 80, New York 78; Utah 107, L.A. Clippers 94; Seattle 113, Sacramento 99.

Conservative Rabbi Paul Dubin, executive vice president of the Board of Rabbis of Southern California, said it is important for the public to realize that "they are not dealing with the majority and mainstream Orthodox. But if it catches on fire and a lot

Rabbi Steven Dworken, director of the Rabbinical Council of America said, "We don't want to disenfranchise any part of the Jewish community regardless of their religious observance, or their lack of it."

Rabbi Einat Ramon, spokeswoman for the Conservative/Masorti Movement said the rabbis' declaration boiled down to the idea that "there's no reason to leave the gate of Israel open to Conservative and Reform Jews...If the Jewish people and the State of Israel take the pluralistic path, then there will be room for everyone, including the Orthodox. If the Orthodox dominate, this will split the Jewish people in two."

"It's a shame to waste the strike weapon when progress can be made in talks," she said.

The attorney-general and state attorney yesterday came to the defense of the police team investigating the Bar-On affair, following reports that Prime Minister's Office director-general Avigdor Lieberman accused the police of "political motives."

In a joint statement, Elyakim Rubinstein and Edna Arbel said they "regretted any reference, if there was such, according to which the police investigating [the affair] have political motives." In reference to reports that Lieberman made such remarks while he was being interrogated. Rubinstein and Arbel added, they wanted to clarify that "the police are doing their work in accordance with the law and in a professional manner, without any [outside] interest."

The clarification was apparently sparked by a Friday report in Ma'ariv, which said Lieberman had hurled insults at the police who last week investigated him for the second time in connection with the appointment of Roni Bar-On as attorney general.

Meanwhile, Justice Minister Tzahi Hanegbi is to be questioned again by police today as part of the ongoing Bar-On affair investigation.

BOB KINGDOM

"DYLAN THOMAS RETURN JOURNEY". Directed by ANTHONY HOPKINS and acclaimed on both sides of the Atlantic, this thrilling "rol-poly word binger" stars BOB KINGDOM in the definitive portrayal of the Welsh poet destined for greatness and despair. KINGDOM moves us with Thomas's soaring poems and wonderful storytelling, including "A Child's Christmas In Wales," his return as an adult to Swansea and epic pub crawl with thirty wild, wet Welshmen.

"BOB KINGDOM SEEMS NOT SIMPLY TO BE PLAYING THOMAS, OR IMITATING THOMAS, BUT BEING THOMAS" Clive Barnes, New York Post

"THE TRUMAN CAPOTE TALK SHOW". From Dylan Thomas, BOB KINGDOM turns the spotlight on another unique and tortured soul, the American author of "Breakfast At Tiffany's" and "In Cold Blood." TRUMAN CAPOTE. Adorable, impish and wicked, Capote's life is chronicled from the golden days of early success to his self-inflicted fall from grace, ravaged by booze and drugs. Glitzy, bitchy, heartbreaking.
